Joy and gratitude become the season. The singing of birds is harmonious with the spirit of melodious praise which should animate our hearts and tune our tongues. The quickening of the germs of vegetable life which begins to cover the earth with beauteous green leaves and sweet-scented flowers, happily symbolizes the fruitfulness of a soul constantly under the quickening influences of the Holy Spirit, causing every power and affection to grow up into Christ, and imparting a vital spiritual energy to every means of grace, and to every truth taught in the word of God. The energetic industry with which the whole country is animated, in putting the new crop into the ground, and in cultivating it according to the season and the growth, should lead us to the most diligent spiritual culture of the powers of the immortal mind, and of the affections and sympathies of the Christian heart. O that the spiritual spring-time were come!

In the spring-time we can better realize—what is true all the time—that life itself is luxuriantly wealthy, independent of circumstances and conditions. We have only to lift up our heads from the peaceful pillows, held in the waning arms of Night, upon which they have reposed, under the shadowing wings of an unseen Providence, free from burdensome cares, and forgetful of the griefs of the past—and the forebodings of the future—we have only to open our eyes, refreshed and relumed by sweet and soothing slumber, and to let the invigorated vision of our minds, and the undivided love of our hearts accompany them—to behold and possess an unbounded realm of beauty, overflowing with treasures of love and of joy. The cheerful daylight, like a newly-discovered heaven, expands without bounds, and flows in upon eye and soul. The whole horizon is filled with a glory "white as the light;" unstained by the wear of years, and unpolluted by contact with the world it blesses, since the primeval day when the fiat of the Almighty called it into being, amid the maiden songs of the morning stars, and the shouts of the newly-created sons of God, as they rejoiced in the genial dawn of the spring season of the creation. It illumines and beautifies the physical world, as "the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world" blesses and beautifies the realm of souls. It brings within the range of the joyous vision the harmoniously adapted forms of nature, the curiously constructed contrivances of art, and the ever [illegible] scenes and motions of human life. It sweeps away the world of opaque mist that would intervene between our light-loving eyes and the grand dome of the broad and beautiful blue sky—the divinely arched roof of our magnificent earthly home—like the passing away from the universe of the startled elements of original chaos, as the sound of the creative voice of God rang through the unfathomable void, calling all things into order and harmony, and sending the instinct and harp-note of musical praise thrilling and sounding through all the nerves and temples of being.—Like the sudden and glorious lifting up of the gloomy curtains of the night of guilt, contrition, doubt and fear, and the rising upon the new-born soul of the healing beams of the Sun of Righteousness, and the overwhelmingly joyous discovery of the reconciled countenance of the Eternal Father, shining in the face of Jesus Christ—Like the first glimpses of the redeemed soul, after the unutterable agonies of death, of the sunny shores of the blessed [illegible] rising into the astonished vision of the infant [illegible], crowned with paradisiacal beauty, disclosing to eye the glorified forms and wafting to the ear, chanted o'er the strange sweet songs, of the "great cloud of witnesses," "an innumerable company of angels," "the general assembly and church of the first-born," our father and mothers, and brothers and sisters, and children and friends, in the flesh and in the Lord, waiting to welcome us to the home of the children of God.

The unutterable beauty of the blessed sunshine in the happy spring-time, warming the cold heart of the earth, and making it genially respond to the entreaties of man, flooding its surface, as well as all nature, with an indescribable and ever-wonderful glory of its own, and creating another and equally wonderful world of beauty and joy, in the sweet songs of the bright spring-birds, in the green robe of young leaves, and in the magnificent crown of many-colored and sweet-scented flowers with which it adorns the footstool of God; can no more be fully appreciated by mind and sense, than can the "beauty of holiness" and the transcendent joy of the heavenly world by the imperfect faith and love and hope of the christian heart. "Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun." The benignity of the smile of God, the mildness and saving power of his ineffable mercy, the unspeakable joy of his love shed abroad in the heart, and the all-creating and all-renewing energy of the Holy Ghost, will never need either testimony or translation so long as the sun shines in the heavens, and sheds his golden light and life-giving power upon the earth—or so long as the spring-time returns at its appointed time, according to the covenant of God, to smoothe the countenance of nature from the frown and wrinkles of winter, to renew the face of the earth, and to proclaim the jubilee of the year.

The analogy is striking and beautiful between the renewing power of the spring-season, and that general spiritual renewal which shall bring all nations under the gentle dominion of the "Prince of Peace."—When "they shall learn war no more;" when the sweet and beauteous charity of God shall be as prevalent and transforming in the souls, tempers, and manners of men, as the April sunshine now is in nature. When the "fruits of the Spirit" shall be as abundant and delightful to the spiritual appetites of man, as the fruits of the earth to his natural appetites.

But when the final restitution of all things shall come, and all our misery shall be exchanged for joy, and all deformity shall give way to harmony and beauty—when the winter season of the world shall give place to the dawn of the first spring-morning of the resurrection—"this mortal shall put on immortality"—"there shall be no more curse"—"and God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away." O! cannot sorrow be endured for this night, when joy cometh in that morning!

What better time than the spring-time, to reform our lives, renew our covenants of human love and friendship, and our vows of holiness and devotion. Let not the blessing of the spring, now resting so richly upon us, and so well calculated to remind us of the benignity of our Heavenly Father, pass away without grateful appreciation, and corresponding improvement.

A PENTECOSTAL REVIVAL.

The mind of the Christian Church in relation to a general revival of religion, seems to be similar to that of many inquiring and penitent persons in relation to conversion—there is desire, and earnestness, and prayer—but there is lack of concentration of thought, of faith, and of effort, upon the one great blessing sought—the outpouring or baptism of the Holy Ghost.

Revivals—at particular times, and in particular places—are common things. But there is no catholicity in them—no communion of the whole Church. There has been no such revival among us, in almost a score of years. This is the revival represented by the pentecostal baptism of the whole primitive ministry and Church as recorded in the acts of the Apostles. This is the revival more especially connected with the Scriptural prophecies and promises of the gift of the Holy Ghost. This is the revival indicated by the current signs and promises of providence. This is the revival needed to put all the operations, enterprises, and interests of the Church into healthful course.

A revival of the whole ministry and Church, must be sought by the whole ministry and Church. It must be as much individual as catholic. So it was on the day of Pentecost. They were all with "one accord," in prayer and supplication—but each one praying for the fiery baptism for himself.

There are indications that a rain of righteousness is about to descend; but it does not come. A few drops of mercy have descended, and are still descending. God is giving indications of his willingness to open the window of heaven and pour out his blessing. The will of God is in favor of such a revival. He is more willing to give the Holy Spirit to those who ask for it, than human parents are to supply the wants of their children. But we must ask for it. This asking must be in faith, nothing doubting. This asking implies a deep sense of want and an entire dependence on God. It must be asked for in the spirit of the publican. Ye ask, but receive not because ye ask amiss. There is much asking that is amiss. This is the reason why the blessing is not given. God has not ceased to be omnipotent and He is able to give the blessing. He is the Almighty God still. From everlasting to everlasting he is God. His hand is not shortened, that he cannot save. It is iniquity that prevents the descent of the blessing. If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me. The sins of unbelief, or pride, or self-will hinders the salvation of God. He did not many mighty works in a certain place, because of their unbelief.

The Church needs to consecrate herself anew to the Lord Jesus Christ. There is in the heart a constant tendency to depart from the living God. The law in the members wars against the law of the mind and brings it into captivity, so that we should cry out, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!" We must receive Christ for strength, wisdom, righteousness and redemption.

Let the Church of the living God remember from whence she has fallen, repent and do her first works. Then it will be consistent with God to turn and heal her. Then will we say, Come, let us return unto the Lord; for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up. After two days will he revive us; in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight. Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord; his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he will come unto us as the rain, as the latter and as the former rain upon the earth." Let all the tithes be brought into the store-house, and the Lord of hosts will pour us out a blessing so that there will not be room enough to receive it.

Rev. Dennis B. Lyne, of the Alabama Conference, stationed at the Navy-yard, at Warrington, near Pensacola, Fla., died on last Wednesday, as we are informed by a private letter. Revs. W. K. Norton and W. P. Miller officiated at the funeral. Mr. Lyne had been in the itinerant ministry about thirteen years; first in the Alabama, then in the Pacific, and again, and last, in the Alabama, Conferences. He was a devotedly pious man and a zealous and faithful minister. His memory will be affectionately cherished by his brethren.

WILL THEY EVER BE GIVEN TO THE PUBLIC?

It is stated that the "Rev. Dr. M. Orie, in his antiquarian researches in London, has discovered the Minutes of the Westminister Assembly, in manuscript, extending over the whole period of its sittings." I wonder if the world will ever be permitted to see the document just as it is.

THE PSALMS OF DAVID.

Who has read them without increasing in spiritual strength, purity and joy! It takes a poet to speak of a poet—hence Christian poets have said the best things of the great poet-laureate of all ages. Lamartine has the following beautiful musings:

The last psalm ends with a chorus to the praise of God, in which the poet calls on all people, all instruments of sacred music, all the elements, and all the stars to join. Sublime finale to that opera of sixty years, sung by the shepherd, the hero, the king and the old man! In this closing psalm we see the almost inarticulate enthusiasm of the lyric poet; so rapidly do the words press to his lips, floating upwards towards God their source, like the smoke of a great fire of the soul wafted by the tempest! Here we see David, or rather the human heart itself, with all its God-given notes of grief, joy, tears and adoration—poetry sanctified to its highest expression; a vase of perfume broken on the step of the temple, and shedding abroad its odors from the heart of David to the heart of humanity! Hebrew, Christian, or even Mohammedan, every religion, every complaint, every prayer has taken from this vase, shed on the heights of Jerusalem, wherewith to give forth their accents. The little shepherd has become the master of the sacred choir of the universe. There is not a worship on earth which prays not with his words, or sings not with his voice. A chord of his harp is to be found in all choirs, resounding every where and for ever in unison with the echoes of Horeb and Engedi! David is the psalmist of eternity; what a destiny—what a power hath poetry when inspired by God! As for myself, when my spirit is excited or devotional, or sad, and seeks an echo to its enthusiasm, devotion, or its melancholy, I do not open Pindar or Horace or Hafiz, those purely Academic poets; neither do I find within myself murmurings to express my emotion. I open the Book of Psalms, and there I find words which seem to issue from the soul of the ages, and which penetrate even to the heart of all generations. Happy the bard who has thus become the eternal hymn, the personified prayer and complaint of humanity! If we look back to that remote age when such songs resounded over the world; if we consider that, while the lyric poetry of all the most cultivated nations only sang of wine, love, blood, the victories of the conquers at the games of Elidna, we are seized with profound astonishment at the mystic accents of the shepherd-prophet, who speaks to God the Creator as one friend to another, who understands and praises His great works, admires His justice, implores His mercy, and becomes, as it were, an anticipative echo of the evangelical poetry, speaking the soft words of Christ before His coming. Prophet or not, as he may be considered by Christian or sceptic, none can deny in the poet-king an inspiration granted to no other man. Read Greek or Latin poetry after a psalm, and see how pale it looks!

The following eloquent extract is from a lecture by Henry Giles on the Psalms of David:

Amongst all compositions, these alone deserve the name of sacred lyrics. These alone contain a poetry that meets the spiritual nature in all its moods and in all its wants, which strengthens virtue with glorious exhortations, gives angelic eloquence to prayer, and almost rises to the seraph's joy in praise. In distress and fear, they breath the low, sad murmur of complaint; in penitence they groan with the agony of the troubled soul. They have a gentle music for the peace of faith; in adoration they ascend to the glory of creation and the majesty of God. For assemblies or for solitude, for all that gladdens and all that grieves, for our heaviness and despair, for our remorse and our redemption, we find in these divine harmonies the loud or the low expression.

Great has been their power in the world. They resounded amidst the court of the tabernacle; they floated through the lofty and solemn space of the temple; they were sung with glory in the halls of Zion; they were sung with sorrow by the streams of Babel.—And when Israel had passed away, the harp of David was still awakened in the Church of Christ. In all the eras and ages of that Church from the hymn which it first whispered in an upper chamber until its anthems filled the earth, the inspiration of the royal prophet has enraptured its devotions and ennobled its rituals.

And thus it has been, not alone in the august cathedral or the rustic chapel. Obscured by the winds of heaven, they have swelled throughout God's own temple of the sky and stars; they have rolled over the broad deserts of Asia, in the matins and vespers of ten thousand hermits. They have rung through the deep valleys of the Alps, in the sobbing voices of the forlorn Waldenses; through the deeps and caves of the Scottish Highlands, in the rude chantings of the Scottish Covenanters; through the woods and wilds of primitive America, in the heroic hallelujahs of the early pilgrims.

Nor is it in the congregation, alone, that David has given to the religious heart a voice. He has given an utterance, also, for its privacy—for the low-lying invalid, soothing the dreariness of pain, softening the monotony of heavy time, supplying the prayer or the promise, with which to break the midnight, or the sleepless hour; for the unhappy, to give them words of sadness, by which to relieve their disquieted and their down-cast souls; by which to murmur between themselves and God, the holy sorrow that heaven alone should hear: for the penitent, when the arrows of conviction rankle in his breast, when the light of grace would seem departed, and the ear of mercy closed—then David gives the cry of his own impassioned deprecation, in supplication and confession. And when contrition has found repose, and the tempest of lamentation been stilled by the assurance of peace, he gives the hymn of his exultant and of his grateful praise.

ABBEY'S GENEALOGICAL BIBLE.

The Holy Bible, with a Perpetual Genealogical Family Register, entirely new and original. New York and Nashville; Richard Abbey; 1858. Published by R. C. Root, Authuny & Co., 16 Nassau st. N. Y; sold by the Southern Methodist Publishing House, Nashville. Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1858, by Richard Abbey, in the Clerk's office of the District Court of the U. S., for the Southern District of New York.

M—— is a shareholder of the Book and Tract Society of the —— Conference to the amount of One Hundred dollars, which entitles —— to this Bible; and for ——self and those inheriting the same, Perpetual Membership in said Society, and to —— dollars annually in Books and Tracts, at Catalogue prices, forever.

The above work has been laid on our table. It is a great and a good book, and should be read by every family in the world. We have read it, and know whereof we affirm. We have been thus particular in giving the title and recorded design of the book, because they explain themselves better than we can. Of the Bible and Family Register we can, and do, speak in highest commendation. Of the manner in which it is to be "geared into" our Publishing House system, we are unable to speak so advisedly. Not accustomed to handle the "harness," we might get hold of the wrong "straps," and "buckle" at the wrong "buckle-holes." Many a dangerous "runaway scrape" has occurred through unskillful "hostlers." We shall not attempt the "gearing." Mr. Abbey and Dr. McFerrin can doubtless adjust it. Mr. Abbey holds the "reins"—the copyright—but Dr. McFerrin owns the animal that is to do the pulling. We hope they will report progress when the "gearing in" is completed.

The Publishing House is prosperous. The Agent is bringing out some valuable new publications; and new editions of standard works. All the presses of the Publishing House are constantly employed, and yet the demand can scarcely be met; such is the growing increase of the business of the establishment. Let its friends rally to its support, and soon its healthful influence will be felt in all portions of the land.

Book Notices.—We have a large number of books on hand, which shall be noticed as soon as possible. We have been absolutely unable to find time for these and other things.

Bishop Soule is again able to leave his home and visit the Publishing House.

TEXAS AND NEW ORLEANS.

The Real Pacific Railroad.

While Congressional schemes for a Pacific Railroad are being fruitlessly agitated, the real railroad to the Pacific is being built. The Opelousas railroad is now running eighty miles, to Berwick's Bay. The Texas and New Orleans railroad, from Houston, is being pushed forward to meet it. By the time the gap between New Orleans and Houston is closed, that between Houston and San Antonio will be closed. This will take time, but it will be done—it is now being done. The Pacific must have a large commercial port for its Eastern terminus, and New Orleans is already provided.

In this connection, we quote from the Marshall Texas Flag:

"New Orleans, above all other great commercial cities, has ever been a favorite with us, and the kind welcome and generous hospitality given and extended to us on our recent trip, have the more endeared us to her liberal and enterprising citizens. And another fact, equally palpable, is, that she has not attained to the one-tenth of the commerce, wealth, and greatness, that she will within the present century; provided she receives the patronage of those whose interests would be greatly promoted by thus bestowing it."

"There are now in New Orleans houses, in the various departments, which import direct from foreign markets every article of commerce, unless an equally good or superior quality of domestic manufacture is to be found at home, with the exception of books and stationery, and bills made in the East will, when desired, be duplicated in New Orleans, at corresponding figures; and the difference in the prices of the exceptions mentioned, is not so great as to make it an object with purchasers when the consequent delays are considered. While there, one of the shrewdest and most thrifty merchants of Eastern Texas arrived, with the view of going to New York to purchase his Spring and Summer stock. He was politely requested to examine the New Orleans market before proceeding which he did, and which resulted in his purchasing. And we had it from his own lips that he had made the cheapest and best purchases he had ever made, in almost every article, although he had heretofore traded at New York, Boston and Philadelphia.

This practice, says the Crescent, is diminishing year by year. The increased imports tell the tale in stronger language than we knew how to employ. We know of many exceptions to the too general rule, like unto the one spoken of by our Marshall friend, however, and all tell the same story. They will tell it to all their friends, and thus an important fact will gradually obtain a practical circulation among the traders of the interior. The sooner this is done the better for us, and all the parties directly concerned. But, until our merchants and business men conclude upon establishing lines of propellers—to two or more leading Continental ports, and thus establish a direct trade with Europe, which would be sure to pay well when fairly under way, we need not hope to be able to compete fully with Northern cities in the sale of a great number of imported articles. They have the monopoly now, have had it from the dawn of commerce on the Western Continent, and will continue to enjoy it until their competitors of the South do as they do—import directly.

It costs as much to import goods to Boston, New York and Philadelphia, as it would to New Orleans; and when our jobbers buy in those quarters, they not only have to shoulder the expenses of importation, the profits which Northern jobbers must make on their ventures to live, but the additional expenses of transporting the same goods South, which are almost as great as transporting them from Europe in the first instance. Hence direct trade would give our importers a commanding advantage over the importers of the Northern cities, at least with the dealers of the Mississippi Valley, and of the fruitful and teeming South and South-West.

Texas is now a profitable customer, and is destined to be our largest customer. She is an empire within herself—is rapidly filling up—is increasing in wealth and population with unexampled strides—and only asks to be allowed to come to us. Shall we meet her advances as they ought to be met, and thereby secure the undivided support of her powerful arm? If yea, let us finish our railroads, and, above all, let us open a direct trade with the main ports of the Continent.

"I WILL GIVE $1000!"

So said a gentleman, a day or two ago, to whom I applied for a subscription to aid in creating a Sunday School Publishing Fund; and this is the way he did it.

Said he: "I suppose you propose to invest this fund, and use only the interest for Sunday School publications."

"Yes," I replied, "that is the intention."

"Well," said he, "I will give you a thousand dollars towards that fund. Now, suppose you loan it to me for five years, and I will pay you better interest than you will probably get by investing elsewhere. I am paying interest for the use of money at this very time, and I had rather pay it to the enterprises of the Church than to any one else. I will pay you ten per cent, per annum, in advance." And, accordingly, he sat down to his desk—signed a note for $1000, payable in five years, with ten per cent. interest in advance; and then drew me a check on his banker for $100, being the interest for the first year.

Was not that noble? Who will be next?

We need this fund for the following purposes:

1. To increase the catalogue of our Sunday School books. Its number, at present, is far below that of other denominations, whose church membership and wealth are less than half of our own; and it is far too limited to meet our urgent wants—so that many of our Schools are driven to the necessity of purchasing the publications of other societies, because we have not been able, for want of funds, to publish the requisite variety ourselves.

2. We need it to enable us to put the prices of our Sunday School publications as low as those of any other society. Many of our own people buy the books of other societies—the American Calvinistic Sunday School Union, for example—simply because they are sold more cheaply than ours. And why can they sell more cheaply? Because they have a constantly growing fund from which to draw the difference between the actual cost of the book or periodical, and the price, below cost, at which they sell it. Give us such a fund and we will put the prices of our Sunday School books and the S. S. Visitor as low as the lowest.

3. We wish this fund so that we may be able to supply Sunday-schools in poor, but often densely peopled neighborhoods, with entire libraries and the Visitor also, gratuitously. We have not been able to do this to any considerable extent heretofore; for we are actually in debt to the Publishing-house for Sunday-school books and Visitors already issued.

4. We need it to enable the editor of the Sunday-school Visitor to make that admirable paper, as attractive by embellishments and illustrations, as others of its class; also, to defray the expense of its publication; for its price, with its present subscription list, does not meet this expense. Must we publish our shame to the world, in the fact that the Church North issues nine times as many copies of their Sunday-school paper as we do of ours? I have visited many Southern Methodist Sunday-schools which were taking Northern Sunday-school papers, because they were cheaper than our own. Let every Sunday-school in our Church patronize our own publications, and this will greatly aid in reducing their prices to an equality with the lowest.

I hope soon to receive many more responses to this call for a $100,000 publishing fund. My post office address is Columbia, S. C.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Pikeville Mission.—Rev. D. S. McDonald, writes: "There are fifteen appointments, to be filled once a month. Up to the First Quarterly Conference, February 20th, seven members were received into the Church, five on probation, and two by certificate. The Sunday-schools, five in number, are all suspended at present. One house of worship has been erected, and several more are needed which will be built this year. The spiritual state of the Church is encouraging, and the prospect of a revival of religion brightening. At one place, last month, God was gracious, and three souls were converted. Blessed be his name."

JEFFERSON CITY SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

The Eighth Anniversary of the Sunday-school in Jefferson City, was celebrated on the 13th inst: A large audience was present and the exercises interesting. The speeches were appropriate and well delivered, evincing the cultivation bestowed by their teachers and friends. Six of them were the original compositions of the excellent Superintendant and his assistants. Rev. J. B. Walker, D. D., Rev. J. R. Hutchinson, D. D., the preacher in charge, Rev. J. Landrum, and W. H. Foster, Esq., were present and encouraged the efforts of the children and the cause of Sabbath-school instruction. Rev. J. D. Parker, Superintendant, deserves great commendation for his labors and success in establishing this useful, and flourishing school.

FLORIDA CORRESPONDENCE.

Clear Water Harbor.

Permit me, Mr. Editor, to say a few words about this place. It is very little known abroad, and a great many do not know that there is such a place in Florida. It is one of the most delightful places on the Southern coast and one of the most beautiful and healthy in Florida. The beach, which runs North and South, is from fifteen to twenty feet above the level of the sea. The Harbor is about two and a half miles wide. There are several little Keys or Islands in front, with two large passes which give us a full view of the Gulf. The channel is large enough for large vessels to come in, and has a good anchorage. It is free from marshes or any other apparent local cause for sickness. There are a great many springs of excellent water bursting forth from the beach: also, sulphur and iron water. The surrounding country is high dry, and healthy. A great many invalids have been restored here to perfect health. It is about five miles East of Tampa Bay. We can raise almost all the tropical fruits, with proper attention. This is a most beautiful place for a Summer residence, and chance now to get building lots. We expect the mail boat to commence runing in July. Society is tolerably good. My health has been improving ever since I came here, and I trust that it will be entirely restored; though I am still unable to labor any.

Yours in truth and love,
C. D. Nicholson.

MEXICO—THE TWO PARTIES.

The eyes of the world are turned to the distracted condition of Mexico. We behold a people incapable of self-government—struggling for life in a civil war. One party is headed by Juarez and the other by Miramon. We find in the Washington States a programme of the principles advocated by each party. The Constitutional party, with President Juarez, is fighting for the following platform of principles.

1. A constitution based on what we would term "State-rights and popular-sovereignty principles."

2. Freedom of conscience and worship.

3. Freedom of the press and supremacy of the ballot-box.

4. The abolition of the corrupting union of Church and State, and the suppression of the fueros or special privileges of the clergy and army.

5. A fair and equal tariff, and freedom from passport and other personal restrictions now in use, which are worthless to the public security, but terrible engines of oppression in the hands of an irresponsible despotism.

6. Liberal treaties, and every encouragement to immigration, and the introduction of skill, capital, and industry from all parts of the world.

8. Reciprocity treaties with the United States which should open to the citizens of both Republics free transits, and an invaluable frontier trade in permanency.

Opposed to Juarez and the Liberal constitution is the Church and army party, now headed by Miramon. They are the "Tories" of Mexico, and are always aided and abetted by the European ministers, because, of their common hatred of the United States, and of our domestic institutions. Their principles of action are:

1. The union of Church and State, with the maintenance of the privileges and exactions of the priestly and military orders.

2. A restricted press and a limited representation of the people.

3. A high tariff and an unlimited indulgence in monopolies and favoritism, by an Executive above and beyond the law.

4. No religion but that of the Catholic church, and no immigration except from Catholic countries.

5. An adverse and restrictive policy towards the United States, and enmity to all democratic institutions.

6. The nullification of State sovereignties, and the overthrow of the Liberal constitution of 1857, with the perpetuation of a series of irresponsible military dictatorships.

7. The establishment of a monarchy in Mexico strongly protected by European alliances, and wholly subservient to an anti-American policy in every commercial and political relation.

Our government must chose its ally between these two parties.

EDITORIAL MISCELLANY.

The Female Temper.—No trait of character is more valuable in a female than the possession of a sweet temper. Home can never be made happy without it; it is like the flowers that spring up in our pathway, reviving and cheering us. Let a man go home at night, wearied and worn out by the toils of the day, and bow soothing is a word dictated by a good disposition! It is sunshine falling upon the heart. He is happy, and the cares of life are forgotten. A sweet temper has a soothing influence over the minds of the whole family. Where it is found in the wife and mother, you observe kindness and love predominating over the natural feelings of a bad heart. Smiles, kind words and looks characterize the children, and peace and love have their dwelling there. Study, then, to acquire and retain a sweet temper. It is more valuable than gold, and captivates more than beauty, and to the close of life retains all its power.

Intimate Friends.—Don't be flattered that friendship authorizes you to say disagreeable things to your intimates. On the contrary, the nearer you come into relation with a person the more necessary do tact and courtesy become. Except in cases of necessity, which are rare, leave your friend to learn unpleasant truths from his enemies. They are ready enough to tell them.

One Verse.—Luther used to say that one verse of the Psalms was sufficient for the meditation of a day; and that he who, at the end of the day, found himself fully possessed of its sense and spirit, might consider his time well spent.

Our National Post-office System—It is beginning to be believed—should be abolished; and the service it renders at so much expense and with so little certainty and satisfaction, be performed by private express-companies. Private enterprise and competition would place mail routes where they are needed—transmit the mail matter with speed, certainty and cheapness—and diminish, somewhat, the expensive and corrupting patronage of the government. A stable government is necessary to the progress of civilization—but too much government, is the great incubus upon the civilization of the present time.

Government Patronage is synonymous with politics corruption. Thirty years ago, one of our best Presidents set the example of making public offices the reward for political services. The plan has been maturing ever since. It has now ripened, and the fruit is now before us in the shape of incompetent public servants, degraded Congressmen, rampant corruption, drunken and dishonest police men, rowdies in the guise of mechanics at the Navy-yard, on every side gross incapacity, fatal shortcomings, and general demoralization!

Secession of California.—The failure of the Pacific Railroad bill in Congress has produced the most intense dissatisfaction in that State, and secession is openly threatened. We are glad to see that our brother of the Pacific Methodist does not join in the threat, but rather conciliates.

Revival in Sweden.—Intelligence has been recently received from Sweden, of a gracious revival of religion. Dalecarlia, Scania, and that part of Finland which borders on Russia, described as the scenes of a most extraordinary work of grace, all classes. Not a few of the nobility have felt its power. Some of the principal families among the aristocracy of Sweden, at the present time, devoting their influence and adding their personal exertions, to spread evangelical truth. Some merchants who two or three years ago, had no sense of religion, but were rather scoffers, are now wholly changed. In instances, country gentlemen have built chapels on their estates, and others have converted their barns into places for religious meetings, and some of the country parish school-masters preach them.

The New Irish Cardinal.—Dr. Cullen, recently elevated to the College of Cardinals, is to remain at Rome, attached to the Propaganda. Dean Kieran succeeds to the Archbishopric of Dublin.

Rev. J. C. Kolar, transferred from the Texas to the Pacific Conference, M. E. Church, South, with his wife, arrived at San Francisco on the steamer Sonora, in good health, and ready to be in the field and at work. So we learn from the Pacific Methodist.

Revivals.—The Western Christian Advocate, of March 9th, records over 4000 recent accessions to the Church. The Chicago Advocate, March 2d, has a list of accessions; the Central of the same date, about 500.

In Aberdeen Scotland, a great work is going on and souls have been added to the Church. The Holy Spirit, answer to prayer, is being poured out, and many, both old and young, are daily awakened, convinced of sin, and can rejoice in the Savior. Such a spirit of prayer, it is said, never been before seen in Aberdeen.

The Jesuits, by a recent decree, have been expelled from Montevideo.

Missionary.

At Aintabeb, in the North Armenian Mission, as we learn from the Missionary Herald, a new Chapel was dedicated the 29th of October with a dedication sermon by the Rev. Mr. Richardson. Mr. Wheeler, from Kharpout, with many native helpers, was present. In the afternoon Baron Garabed, a native preacher, at Aga, preached. The communication of the Lord's Supper was celebrated, previous to which three new members were received on profession, with ten others by letter. Among others present was a Turkish colonel, the actiug Governor of the City, who came with his escort of soldiers. On the following Monday (November 1st) a very interesting scene took place.

In China, the Northern Methodists have had a Church in which will take $500 or $1000 to replace it. The Bishop of Victoria, Hong Kong, has written a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury on the present religious aspect of affairs in China. The letter has called forth some animadversions on part of the bishop's commendation of the American Missionaries who assisted in making the American treaty; and who, the bishop himself, are anti-opium in their sentiments. A further letter gives an account of the wide openings in the interior for the spread of the gospel. Three large cities are named as desirable points for the establishment of new missions. Each of these cities, Soo Chow, is supposed, at the lowest estimate, to contain three millions of souls.

Fortieth Annual Report of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.—This says, the Society is one of the oldest religious institutions in this city, having formed forty years ago. Two officers and managers at the first were forty, of whom, so far as we remember, only five are living, four of whom are still members of the Board of Managers and have continued so from the formation of the Society. They are eight foreign missions, viz: Africa, South America, Germany, India, Scandinavia, Bulgaria, and the Sandwich Islands. In the foreign work there are employed, 47 missionaries, 102 assistant do., 2,975 church members and probationers, schools and 2,251 scholars.

South America.—A letter from Mr. Pratt, dated January 3d, says that the violent opposition excited against missionaries some months since, had, in a great measure, subsided, but with it the attendance upon public preaching has been diminished. The school is well attended, and is doing a good work. The attendance upon public preaching varied from thirty to fifty, most of whom were natives.

PROFESSOR AGASSIZ.—Professor Agassiz has visited every State in the East of the Rocky mountains, except Iowa and Texas, accompanioned always by one or more assistants, and has laid so broad and deep the foundations of his museum, as to make it certain that his collection will become a monument to his own acquirements and industry, an everlasting fountain of knowledge to our commonwealth, and the envy of the world.

MR. PARTON, author of the "Life of Aaron Burr," has been making researches in Nashville for materials for his biography of General Andrew Jackson. In two or three days he discovered such a mass of matter that the mere copying involved an expenditure of one hundred and fifty dollars.

SPURGEON.—Mr. Spurgeon having declared that he would not visit America, lest in the public mind he should be complicated with personal, financial, and sectarian schemes, a document, signed by responsible gentlemen of various denominations has been forwarded to him urging him to revoke that decision, and guarantying him against the petty annoyances to which he refers.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

THERE is living in Anderson, Texas, a negro man, 120 years old, who was at the battle of Guilford Court House, and has a vivid recollection of the scenes of that day. He is a bale old man.

THE DEBT OF GREAT BRITAIN.—In 1783 the British national debt amounted to $1,241,863,173. In 1858 this debt amounted to $3,876,563,768. Were this sum laid down in guineas in a line it would extend more than 13,421 miles; if in British shillings, it would extend more than ten and a half times round the globe. The sum in solid silver would weigh 136,477½ tons, and would require 181,938 horses to draw it, allowing 15 cwt. for each horse.

RAISING A FAMILY.—A Utah correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer states, as a fact, that Heber Kimball had fourteen children born to him in the month of November last, all doing well.

IT IS ESTIMATED that at least four thousand persons in the United States Navy, annually, are tatooed with figures, costing from seventy-five cents to fifteen dollars, and showing the annual expenditure in the aggregate of twenty thousand dollars! A single "artist" has been known to pocket over a thousand dollars in a cruise of a frigate, in these Indian-ink pictures.

VISITING CARDS, containing photographs of the visiting parties, are the latest novelty in England.

THE BRITISH BOQUET.—Some natives in Bengal have petitioned Queen Victoria, praying for the introduction of the Indian lotus in the national emblems of the rose, the thistle and the shamrock.

A REMARKABLE FACT.—A Baptist clergyman and his wife, who reside in the vicinity, have the pleasure of daily gathering around their fireside four daughters, who were born in four different quarters of the globe, viz: one in Europe, one in Asia, one in Africa, and one in America.—N. Y. Express.

A GOOD IDEA.—The English druggists are about adopting a hexangular bottle with deep flutings, to put poisons in which are sold by retail. This is to prevent persons making mistakes by getting hold of the wrong bottle. As an additional security the neck of the bottle is so contracted that but a drop at a time can be poured out. The very deliberate and exertions action thus produced will, it is believed, deter any one from taking doses of medicine; while it is difficult to imagine a case in which a person could pour out and take the whole contents of one of these bottles in mistake for something else.

PLENTY OF ROOM.—East of the Mississippi there are twenty-six States and one District, containing 670,000 square miles, and 25,000,000 of people. Total area West of the Mississippi, 2,084,000 square miles. Total population West of the Mississippi, 3,131,000 persons.

A REPRESENTATIVE QUESTION.—A writer in the Pacific Methodist asks the editor the following questions:

"Where are those valiant spirits who, about the commencement of your paper, were talking so bravely about their hundreds of subscribers! Are they all dead? If so, why were not their obituaries published? I always like to read the triumphant deaths of such daring spirits! If no such notices have been written, will you please ascertain their last resting places, so that the lovers of your paper may be able to repair to the sacred spots and drop a tear over departed worth?"

GEN. QUITMAN attributed the cause of his decline, up to the last moment of his life, to poison administered to him in the shape of arsenic, while a resident of the National hotel in Washington.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

LOCAL.

THE LATE JOHN M. BELL.—It will be a melancholy satisfaction to the friends of this lamented gentlemen to know that his body has been recovered and honored with the rites of sepulture. It was not as much disfigured as might have been expected, there was a severe bruise on one side of the head, besides some scalds, none of them however sufficient to produce death. Death, was evidently caused by drowning. It had evidently been found by some scoundrels, and turned adrift after being plundered of money, watch, shirt studs, sleeve buttons, etc. What a terrible commentary upon the depravity of human nature.

HON. F. C. LAVILLE, who was so terribly injured by the explosion of the Princess, and who has been lying several weeks at Baton Rouge, has so far recovered as to admit of his removal home. Although his legs were awfully crushed, it is certain that one will be saved, and strong hopes are entertained that the other will be also.

FOREIGN.

War Imminent.

LIVERPOOL, March 12.—The Paris correspondent of the London Herald says: The hopes of the continuance of peace are daily melting away under the influence of war articles in the semi-official journals of Paris. The extensive military preparations of France are progressing with unabated vigor. The success of Lord Cowley's mission is now considered doubtful. The telegram to the London Times says that Lord Cowley bears a counter proposition from the Austrian Government, which it was hoped would settle the difficulties on the Italian question.

Austria Army in Italy.—The Paris Constitutionel says that the effective force of the Austrian army in Italy has been increased from 50,000 men to 180,000. Large quantities of ammunition, and cannon of a large size, have arrived at Pavia and Venice.

A Government Measure Defeated.—The House of Commons have rejected the bill presented by the Government for the partial abolition of the Church rates, by a large majority.

Arrival of the Niagara and Alps.

LIVERPOOL, March 12.—The British Parliament have been mostly occupied in discussing the Government Reform bill. The question of reform is the engrossing topic of the press, and seems to be uppermost in the public mind of England.

Lord John Russell has given notice in Parliament of his intention to offer an amendment to the bill, which threatened to upset the present ministry.

Lord Cowley's peace mission to Austria is thought to have been successful. He had left Vienna, and it was reported that he is the bearer of a satisfactory proposition for the settlement of the difficulties between France and Austria upon the Italian question.

The latest reports of Paris correspondents of the London press are, however, of a less pacific character. The French funds at Paris have declined 1 per cent. owing to unfavorable reports.

The Sardinian government still continued its preparations for war, and maintained a warlike attitude.

Later from Venezuela.

Later advices from Venezuela have been received at New York, confirming previous reports respecting the nut-breaks in that country. The accounts are to 11th inst. The country was still in a disturbed state owing to the political movements of various parties. The province of Care had declared in favor of a Federal Government. A revolt at Maricaibo was momentarily expected and there were indications of a general revolution, for the purpose of reinstating Gen. Monagas.

Sandwich Islands.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 5.—Advice has been received from the Sandwich Islands announcing a destructive volcanic eruption on Manna Loa. A whole village, was destroyed by the burning leva. No lives were lost, as the inhabitants were able to flee from the village before being overtaken by the streams of liquid fire. The volcano was still in active eruption.

DOMESTIC.

Terrible Steamboat Disaster.

CINCINNATI, March 29.—Two Steamboats Sunk—Twenty Lives Lost.—The steamer Nat Holmes, bound from Pittsburg to St. Louis, with 145 passengers on board, mostly Pike's Peak emigrants, came in collision with the steamer David Gibson, bound from New Orleans to Cincinnati, with a cargo of sugar and molasses, and both steamers sunk in a few minutes. The collision occurred nearly opposite Aurora, Indiana, last night. The cabins of the steamers floated off. Fifteen or twenty lives are supposed to have been lost from among the Nat Holme's passengers. One account says only about one hundred passengers were saved. The steamer Gibson had but few passengers, all of whom are supposed to have been saved. Two or three of the crew are among the missing.

VICKSBURG, March 28.—The Crevasse above Vicksburg.—No efforts are being made to close the Crevasse at White's plantation, and the water is rushing in rapidly. The water in the Bayou Macon is rising fast. The river at this point is half an inch above the highest mark of last year, and is rising at the rate of three-fourths of an inch in twenty-four hours. The water is on a stand from Memphis down to Helena, and rising from Helena down to this point.

WASHINGTON, March 28.—The Washington Union newspaper establishment was sold to-day. Gen. Bowman, the Superintendant of Public Printing was the purchaser.

NEW YORK, March, 26.—A Secret Filibustering Expedition against Cuba.—The New York "Courrier des Etats Unis" publishes a statement which it considers reliable, disclosing the existence of an extensive secret filibustering organization for the invasion of Cuba. The Courrier says that the expedition is fully organized, and ready to start for Cuba immediately on the receipt of instructions, which are expected by the next steamer from Havana. It is represented that the head quarters of the expedition is in the city of New York, and that plenty of arms and ammunition are at their command in various Southern cities, and that a large number of men are ready to embark for Cuba simultaneously, from different parts of the Union. The Courrier also says that secret agents are engaged in Cuba in preparing facilities for access in landing on the coast of Cuba.

ST. LOUIS, March 22.—An Indian Land Claim.—The Fort Smith Times says, that the Cherokee Indians, who were driven from Texas some years since, are about to commence a suit for their lost territory, which embraces some of the most fertile portions of Eastern Texas.

WASHINGTON, March 22.—Mr Churchill has arrived with dispatches from Vera Cruz to the State Department, which state President Juarez is gaining strength daily, and can hold out against Miramon, even if Miramon should succeed in taking Vera Cruz.

Mr. Churchill, the bearer of these dispatches, advises our Government to recognize the Juarez Government.

General Miramon was still at Orizaba, to which place he had retreated after the defeat of a portion of his troops, numbering 1500 men under Gen. Cobos, by the Liberals under Gen. Llave.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION.—The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, states there is scarcely a doubt that the diplomatic part of our Paraguay expedition will fail, and the military wing of the same will be, if it has not already been, culled into action. The offer of the government of Brazil to act as mediator in the dispute, though one very proper to be made by that government and to be accepted by this, cannot be now availed of. It is too late. Were it now accepted by this government, instructions to that effect could not reach Judge Bowlin for some weeks. The next thing we shall hear of will probably be the attack of our steamers, with the Dahlgreen, on the fort above the three mouths.

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 15.—Postmaster General Brown's Funeral.—The remains of ex-Governor Aaron V. Brown, late Postmaster General, arrived in this city at 9 o'clock this morning. They were met at the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad station by a large concourse of citizens, including the military of the city, with the Masonic and other fraternities in full regalia. The procession proceeded to the State capitol, where the funeral services were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Quintard, of the Episcopal Church, and the Rev. Dr. Summers, of the Methodist Church.

THE JUAREZ GOVERNMENT TAKEN REFUGE IN THE CASTLE We are informed by a gentleman from Minatitlan, who received the intelligence from the officers of the steamer Jasper, direct at that port from Vera Cruz, that the Juarez Government, President, Secretaries and all, had taken up quarters in the castle of San Juan de Ulun; and that all official business would henceforth be transacted there so long as danger impends upon the city.

THE MAMMOTH STEAMER GREAT EASTERN find been formally registered at the Liverpool Customhouse, in name of the Great Ship Company as owners, free from incumbrances. The first step towards preparing the vessel for sea had been made by hoisting in the main shaft of the paddle engines, by means of Bishop's derrick. The weight of the shaft is about forty tons.

THE DIAL, long announced in London as the daily paper that is to annihilate the Times, will, it is stated, positively appear with the first parliamentary proceedings. The Dial will complete the number of London daily papers to twenty—fourteen morning and six evening. The Sun was to have eclipsed the Times, but the result was a total eclipse of the Sun.

COTTON FACTORY IN VICKSBURG.—$30,000 have been subscribed for the establishment of a cotton factory in Vicksburg, and those engaged in the enterprise have no fears of being able to raise $60,000, the sum of cash with which it is proposed to commence operations.

THE CANADIAN PARLIAMENT is about to petition the Queen Victoria to cross the ocean, and open the first Parliament in Ottawa, which is henceforth to be the capital of Canada.

LARGE FIRE AT TUSCALOOSA.—The Mobile Advertiser learns that the extensive foundry of Messrs. Leede & Avery, at Tuscaloosa, was totally destroyed by fire on the morning of the 5th inst. Loss, $18,000. No insurance.

NEW ORLEANS AND NASHVILLE MAILS.—The Nashville Banner, of the 5th inst., says: The Postmaster General having changed the New Orleans mail from the route by which it was regularly received here in between three and four days to some other route, it is now invariably seven to eight days coming through.

A NUMBER OF CHINESE, remarkably intelligent, arrived at Nantes, France, in order to prepare for the Catholic priest-hood; two of them have been ordained, and one of them preached on a recent Sunday in the Cathedral in that city. A great concourse of people attended.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, March 29, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New-Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 26th inst.: The operations of the week in our leading staples generally have been to but a moderate extent, though within the past few days favorable European advices have given a more active impulse to the demand for Cotton, and have also enabled factors to obtain improved rates. Sugar was very heavy in the early part of the week, but has rallied within the last day or two, while Molasses has yielded slightly, under the pressure of receipts in excess of the demand. In Tobacco there is not much movement, and the transactions are of a limited character in nearly all articles of Western Produce.

COTTON.—The sales of the first three days reached but a moderate extent, the unfavorable weather and very full prices generally claimed interfeared with transactions, summing up about 22,000 bales, the rates in the meantime showing an improvement of ⅛ to ¼c. per pound. On Wednesday the market opened with a moderate inquiry, but a more active impulse was given to the demand about noon by receipt of later and more favorable European advices, brought to Portland, Maine, by the steamer Nova Scotian, from Liverpool, 9th inst. Under the influence of these advices buyers came forward, and the sales reached about 16,000 bales, the market closing at very full rates. On Thursday buyers were met by advanced claims, which tended to obstruct operations, though some 10,000 bales were taken, at very full prices, and an advance of ⅛c. was realized in some instances. On Friday there was again a good attendance of buyers, and further sales were effected to the extent of about 10,000 bales, the advantage in prices being still on the side of sellers. Thus making a total for the past three days of 42,000 bales; and for the whole of the week of 54,000 bales; the receipts, during same period, 34,280; and the exports, 52,570 bales. Stock, in Presses and on ship-board, not cleared on the 25th inst. 446,741 bales. With respect to prices, we have already stated that they have continued to tend in favor of sellers, and the further advance since receipt of the Nova Scotian's advices is about ⅛ to ¼c. on nearly all grades. The lower grades have attracted more attention at the wide difference in prices, and they have partaken to a considerable extent in the business of the week, and also in the improvement.

Liverpool, March 12.—The sales of Cotton during the week ending on Friday amounted to 71,200 bales. The sales on speculation during the same period amounted to 16,000 bales. All qualities of Cotton have advanced during the week ¼ to ⅛d. The recent advices from the United States chiefly caused the advance: finer qualities ⅛d. and middling 1d. on quotations by the Asia. The sales on Friday 10,000 bales, at the following quotations: Fair—Orleans, 8; Mobile, 7¾; Uplands, 7¼; Middling—Orleans, 7 5-16; Mobile, 7 3-16; Uplands, 7d. The stock of Cotton at Liverpool is 358,600 bales, of which 313,000 are American. Some authorities say the advance at the early part of the week was not fully maintained on the middling and lower grades at the close of the week.

Havre, March 12.—The Cotton market closed firm and quiet. All qualities have slightly advanced during the week—Orleans has has advanced 1f. Sales of the week, 13,000 bales. Orleans tres ordinaire 104f., Orleans bas 99f.

New York, March 26.—The Cotton market closed quiet at 12¼c. for Uplands; sales, 1000 bales. Flour firm at previous quotations—sales, 15,000 bbls. Corn, prices unchanged—sales, 41,000 bushels. Pork, Eastern Mess, $17 50 to 18 25. Sugar is firm at previous quotations. Lard Oil is selling at 97c. to $1.

Cincinnati, March 20.—Flour is steady; Pork, Western Mess, $17 to 17 75. Lard, sales of 100 tierces at 11¼c. Linseed Oil is selling at 75c. Sugar, steady at 7 to 7¾c. Molasses, 34 to 34½c. Coffee is firm at 12 to 12½c.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

PUBLISHING-HOUSE NOTICES.

"NEW EDITIONS of a great many of our books have just been printed, and others are in the press. Life of Capers is likely to have a good run; Theophilus Walton already has it—the eleventh thousand is out. Watson's Dictionary enlarged, with New Biblical Atlas and Gazetteer, the second edition beautifully brought out; Australia, Art of Printing, Chapters for Children, Dawn of Civilization, Alfred the Great, Learning to Feel, Fifty Beautiful Ballads, and others of this class, are in the list—a good sign for the young folks: we are glad to see a demand for this kind of reading. The Dairymaid's Daughter, with an introduction containing nearly half as much matter as Mr. Richmond's narrative. The wonder has been expressed that any one could write the history of the Isle of Wight without noticing the Dairyman's Daughter; some may perhaps wonder that Mr. Richmond could write her life without hinting that she was a Wesleyan Methodist. We presume he suppressed this fact, to secure for his book admission into circles where Methodism was at a great discount. Our addition to the narrative gives it great interest, while the cost is not increased. Our Sunday-school Hymns, Questions on Genesis, and Southern Methodist Primer, are reprinted in large editions: let them be everywhere introduced. The editor's little book on Holiness is also in the list of reprints: the times seem to demand a plain, scriptural, Wesleyan essay on this subject, and ours has been considered not unmeet for the place it occupies. There is also a new edition of our book on Baptism. We may take occasion to say, that after reading a great many new works on that subject, we have found nothing that we consider necessary to add to our treatise. We presume there are very few available arguments, if any, that have not been pressed into service. Several books, etc., have been written in reply to the treatise: we have not read them, but our friends who have, assure us that our positions are fruitlessly assailed: we advanced none but such as we thought would stand the test. As the book covers all the points belonging to the subject of Baptism, some of our bishops, and other leading men, have recommended it as a suitable text-book for those who may not be able to find another so convenient for the purpose. We are pleased to see a demand for a new edition of Bishop Pierce's Incidents of Western Travel, to which another chapter (on Texas) has been added, increasing the value of this interesting work. A large edition of Songs of Zion, a Supplement to our Church Hymn Book, and the best collection of hymns and spiritual songs apart from that work, and another of the Discipline, have also been issued—a favorable symptom. Those excellent little books, Home, by Hay, and Family Government, by Bishop Andrew, and others which we cannot now specify, are in the list. Our Fifty Dollar Young People's Library will be kept full, ready for the largest demands. Our friends would do well to send for the Almanac, containing the Catalogue, and make out orders to supply the schools in this springtide of the year.

"IN PRESS.—We are printing a valuable work by Dr. Sasnett, entitled, "Discussions in Literature and Religion:" it contains the best of his essays, furnished from time to time to various periodicals, addresses, etc., carefully corrected and revised. It will be a portly duodecimo. The numerous friends of Dr. S. will be glad to see these valuable papers reproduced in this form. We need not say the author is one of the most vigorous thinkers of the age. Dr. M'Tyeire's prize essay on the "Duties of Masters," has been revised and enlarged—we should rather say rewritten—and will deservedly take its place with the standard literature of our Church: we bespeak for it a universal circulation—a work of this sort is greatly needed. The Life of Adam Clarke, by Dr. Etheridge, which was noticed in this Journal at the time of its first appearance in England, advance sheets having been kindly sent us by the Wesleyan editor in London, will be a rich addition to our biographical literature. It has had already an immense run in England. The Old Life of Clarke is an interesting but chaotic work—compared with which this a perfect cosmos: we have writers among us, perhaps, who could have produced its equal, had they been in possession of the materials which the family of Dr. C. and the British Conference laid at the disposal of the learned biographer.

"THE MINUTES OF THE ANNUAL CONFERENCES OF THE M. M. CHURCH, SOUTH, for 1858, show an increase of 43,398 ministers and members, during the year. The increase would be about 44,000 if several charges in the Kentucky Conference had been reported. This would make the total number of ministers and members about 700,000: the figures reported are 699,175. The delay in the issue of this Annual was occasioned by the non-reception of statistics from certain quarters. We make up the statistics of the Pacific Conference from a Church paper, the official copy not having yet reached us."

All the Books Published by the Church, South—that is, the Books in the FIRST PART of the Catalogue issued at Nashville—we have, and sell at NASHVILLE PRICES. Of the SECOND PART, we have only the following Books, which we sell at the prices annexed, less 20 per cent. on time, and 25 per cent. for cash.

Of these Books we have not time now to speak particularly. Suffice it at present to mention "Bledsoe's Theodicy" at $1 50, and in Turkey at $2—the greatest thunderbolt forged against Calvinism in three centuries. It has proved itself exceedingly troublesome to all of that faith; in fact, as "horrible" to them as the Decree was to Calvin.

OUR OWN BOOKS.

Whenever we see a good thing we like to circulate it, to wit:—

"Mind your Own Business, is an old injection which cannot be too scrupulously observed. Especially would we urge it upon our Church in regard to our publishing interests. The time was when we had to depend upon others for our religious literature, not having a book or paper in the land that we could call our own. But our circumstances have changed; we now have an ample supply of weeklies, monthlies, and quarterlies, the largest list of general religious reading books and Sunday-school books printed in this (Southern) country, many of which have reached to an almost unparalleled circulation. Besides we have multiplied greatly in our numbers and wealth. Only let us purchase, read and circulate the issues of our own press first, and as largely as they deserve, and we shall extend our achievements beyond the highest expectations of the most believing ones among us. Scarcely a day passes which does not reveal some new success of our press. Let us be of good cheer then, and push on in our "great work;" rejoicing always and heartily in the great good being done by others, but attending faithfully to the peculiar work which God in his wise providence has assigned to us."

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

THE BABE OF HEAVEN.

"Does you love God?"

The question came from a sweet pair of lips. Opposite sat a young gentleman of a striking exterior. The man and the child were journeying in a stage-coach. The latter sat on her mother's knee. Her little face beautiful beyond description, looked out from a frame of delicate lace-work. For four hours, the coach had been rolling on over an unequal road; and the child had been very whining in her little ways—lisping songs; letting her bright blue eyes often to her mother's face; then falling back, in a little, old-fashioned, contented way, into her mother's arms, saying, by the mute action, "I am happy here."

For more than an hour, the dear babe, scarce yet entering the rosy threshold of her fifth year, had been answering the smiles of the young man, who had been pleased with her beauty. He had nodded his head to her little tones; he had offered her his pearl-handled pen-knife to play with; and, at last, his heart went over to her at every glance. The mild blue eyes, full of the innocence of a holy love and a trusting faith, made his pulses leap with a purer joy; and, as the coach rattled on, he began to wish the end of the journey were not so very near.

The child had been sitting for the last fifteen minutes, regarding the young man with a glance that seemed almost solemn; neither smiling at his caresses, nor smiling in the dear face that bent above her.

A thoughtfulness seemed to spread over the young brow that had never yet been shadowed by care; and as the coach stopped at the last door, and the passengers moved uneasily preparatory to leaving, she bent towards the young man, and lisped, in her childish voice, these words:

"Does you love God?"

He did not understand her at first, in the confusion, and bent over nearer; and the voice asked again, clearly, almost eagerly—

"Does you love God?" the thoughtful, inquiring eyes, meantime, scanning into his own.

The young man drew back hastily, blushing to the very roots of his hair. He looked in a sort of confused, abrupt way at the child, who, frightened at his manner, had hidden her face in her mother's bosom; turned to the coach-door; gave another look back, as if he longed to see her face, and then left the coach.

He hurried to his hotel; but the little voice went with him. There was an echo in his heart, constantly repeating the question of the child—"Does you love God?"

Several gay young men met him at his hotel. They appeared to have been waiting for him, and welcomed him with mirth that was almost boisterous. They had prepared an elegant supper; and, after he had been to his room, escorted him to the table. The full gleam of the gas fell upon the glittering furniture; red wines threw shadows of a lustrous crimson hue athwart the snowy linen. There were mirth, wit, faces lighted with pleasure—every thing to charm the eye and please the palate; but the young man was conscious of a void never experienced before. His heart ached to see the child again; and over and over he seemed to hear her words—

"Does you love God?"

His name was Gilbert. Only twenty-three years of age, he was a good scholar, and esteemed by his friends a genius. Already he had made his mark as a writer; but he had never at his best thought to-night, on the solemn import of that simple question—

"Does you love God?"

It came to him when he held the red wine to his lips; it was not amid the clatter of the billiard-balls, the shouts of merry laughter that filled the wide room everywhere. Whichever way he turned, he saw the earnest glance of that blue-eyed child, heard the low voice laughing, the low voice asking thrillingly—

"Does you love God?"

It followed him to his bedside. He had tried to drown it in wine, in song, in careless levity. He strove to sleep it away, but heard it in his dreams. The next night he met a fashionable friend. He was to take her to some place of pleasure. She was very beautiful, in dazzling robes—the gleam of pearls and the lustre of silk and lace vied with each other to enhance her loveliness; but, as she came smiling into the room with smiles on her young red lips and a welcome in her words, there too, floating solemnly at her side, the presence of that angel-child. The better feeling her innocent presence had awakened were yet warm; and before he knew it, the young man said, quickly and earnestly—

"Does you love God?"

"What do you mean?" exclaimed the young girl, with a start of surprise.

"I was thinking, as you came in, of a lovely child I saw yesterday," he replied. "As I was in the act of leaving the coach, she suddenly looked up and asked me that question."

"And pray, what put it into the child's head? What did you answer?"

"I am ashamed to say, I was not prepared with an answer," replied the young man casting down his eyes.

That night, pleasure had no gratification for him. His feet trod languidly the mazes of the dance, his smiles were forced; and more than once, it was said of him, "He does not seem himself."

He: he was not like the gay, thoughtless self of former years. There was a still pool lying in his bosom, the waters of which had never before been disturbed.

Now, a little child had dropped a pebble in, and the vibration was to go on through eternity.

And travel-weary, a thoughtful man walked the principal street of a large Western city. As he went on, apparently absorbed in his own meditations, his eye accidentally encountered a face looking down from the window of a handsome house. His whole countenance suddenly changed. He paused an instant, looked eagerly at the window, and in another moment, his hand was on the bell-handle. He was ushered into the very room where sat the lady of the house.

"You will pardon my intrusion," he said; "but I could not pass by, after seeing you accidentally at the window. I have never forgotten you nor your little girl, who, five years ago in a stage coach, put to me the artless question, 'Does you love God?' Do you remember?"

"I think I do," said the lady smilingly, "from the circumstance that you seemed so much startled and confused; but my dear child asked almost every person with whom we met that or similar questions."

"Her innocent face is engraven on my heart," said the young man with much emotion. "Never since that day have I been tempted to do that which my conscience would not sanction, but the earnest, serious gaze with which she regarded me before she asked that question, has come to my mind. Would she remember me, do you think? Absurd, thought: of course she would not. But I should remember her anywhere, under any circumstances. Can I not see her, madam? Is she at home with you? I long to take her in my arms, and hear once more the voice that God has used to draw my heart to him."

Strange, that in his eagerness, he did not notice that paling cheek, the quiver of the mother's lips, the sudden placing of her hand against her heart! Strange, also, that he did not mark the absence of pattering feet; of little, gentle indications that a child's fingers had been busy in the room about him.

Suddenly, as he ceased speaking, there came over him a startling consciousness. He saw the tear-stained cheek turned toward the window: he noticed the garments of sombre hue; he heard the silence reigning within.

"Madam—is—the child"——

"She is in heaven," came low and brokenly from the trembling lips.

The young man sank back on his seat, agitated, dumb—sorry he had so rudely torn open the still bleeding wound in that womanly heart.

"This is sad tidings," he said, after a long pause, and his voice was troubled. "Dear little angel! she is then speaking to me from this grave."

The mother arose, and beckoned him to follow her. Into a little hallowed chamber she went, where, in a case, were the books the child loved, her Bible, her beautiful rewards, her childish toys.

"Here," the mother, now quite broken down, and sobbing, "here is all that is left on earth of precious——"

"Nay; that is not all that is left: I am here, a monument of God's mercy, made so through her holy influence. Before she asked me that question, on that eventful day, my mind was a chaos of doubt, of bewildering and conflicting errors. I had been to question the existence of an Almighty Creator. I had scoffingly thrown my taunts at him, who, in great forbearance, has forgiven me. My influence for evil was unlimited: because men looked up to me, and chose me for their leader. I was going the downward path—groping blindly in a labyrinth of error—and dragging others with me. Madam, by this time I might have been a debauchee, a libertine, a God-defying wretch, but for her unlooked for question—'Does you love God?' Oh! those voice! that look! that almost infinite sorrow! that divine calm, that, through her, glanced into my soul! Madam, these tears bear witness that your child left more than precious dust and perishing toys."

Slowly bowing down, the strong man wept like a child. All he said was true; for he held the hearts of men in his hands. He spoke, he was one of the strong ones of earth; and all that mighty mind was employed in spreading the tidings of man's redemption through Jesus Christ.

Little children do a mighty work!

Are you in the sweet accents of the babe of heaven, is there [illegible] in your heart, asking:

"Does you love God?"

Humorous.

Dr. Cooper.

Dr. Cooper, of South Carolina College, was one of the best natured of men, and profoundly skilled in human nature. We know no anecdote more characteristic of him than the following:

On one occasion, when he entered the lecture-room, he found the class all seated with most unwonted punctuality, and looking wondrous grave. Mischief was brewing, and it was apparent that they were prepared for a burst of laughter as the old doctor waddled along to the professor's chair, for there sat an old he-goat, bolt upright, lashed to the chair. But they were disappointed of their fun, for instead of getting angry and storming at them, he mildly remarked, "Aha! young gentlemen! quite republican, I see, in your tendencies—fond of a representative government—elevated one of your own number to the chair, ha! Well, well, it is all right. I dare say the present incumbent can fill it as well as any of you. You may listen to his lecture to-day. Good-bye! Don't feel sheepish about it!" And away he went, without leaving a smile behind him.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

WITHOUT AND WITHIN.—BY R. H. STODDARD.

I.

The night is dark, and the winter winds
Go stabbing about with their icy spears;
The sharp hail rattles against the panes,
And melts on my cheeks like tears!

'Tis a terrible night to be out of doors,
But some of us must be, early and late!
We need n't ask who, for do n't we know
It has all been settled by Fate?

Not woman, but man. Give woman her flowers,
Her dresses, her jewels, or what she demands:
The work of the world must be done by man,
Or why has he brawny hands?

As I feel my way in the dark and cold,
I think of the chambers warm and bright—
The nests where these delicate birds of ours
Are folding their wings to-night!

Through the luminous windows, above and below,
I catch a glimpse of the life they lead:
Some sew, some sing, others dress for the Ball,
While others (fair students) read.

There 's the little lady who bears my name—
She sits at my table now; pouring her tea;
Does she think of me as I hurry home,
Hungry and wet? Not she.

She helps herself to the sugar and cream,
In a thoughtless, nonchalant way.
Her hands are as white as the virgin rose
That she wore on her wedding day!

My stubbed fingers are stained with ink—
The badge of the Ledger, the mark of Trade;
But the money I give her is clean enough,
In spite of the way it is made!

I wear out my life in the counting-room,
Over day-book and cash-book; Bought and Sold:
My brain is dizzy with anxious thought,
My skin is as sallow as gold!

How does she keep the roses of youth
Still fresh in her cheeks? My roses are flown:
It lies in a nutshell—why do I ask?
A woman's life is her own!

She gives me a kiss when we part for the day,
Then goes to her music, blithe as a bird!
She reads it at sight, and the language too,
Though I know never a word!

She sews—a little; makes collars and sleeves;
Or embroiders me slippers (always too small!)
Nets silken purses (for me to fill!)—
Often does nothing at all!

But dream in her chamber, holding a flower,
Or reading my letters (she 'd better read me!);
Even now, while I am freezing with cold,
She is coolly sipping her tea!

If I ever reach home, I shall laugh aloud
At the sight of a roaring fire once more.
She must wait, I think, till I thaw myself,
For the usual kiss at the door!

I'll have with my dinner a bottle of port,
To warm up my blood and soothe my mind,
Then a little music, for even I
Like music—when I have dined!

I'll smoke a pipe in the easy chair,
Or feel her behind me patting my head;
Or, drawing the little one on my knee,
Chat till the hour for bed!

II.

Will he never come? I have watched for him
Till the misty panes are roughened with sleet:
I can see no more: I shall I never hear
The welcome sound of his feet?

I think of him in the lonesome night,
Tramping along with a weary tread,
And wish he were here by the cheery fire,
Or I were there in his stead!

I sit by the grate, and hark for his step,
And stare in the fire with a troubled mind!
The glow of the coals is bright in my face,
But my shadow is dark behind!

I think of woman, and think of man,
The tie that binds, and the wrongs that part,
And long to utter in burning words
What I feel to-night in my heart.

No weak complaint of the man I love,
No praise of myself, or my sisterhood;
But—something that women understand—
By men never understood!

Their natures jar in a thousand things;
Little matter, alas, who is right or wrong,
She goes to the wall! "She is weak," they say:
It is that that makes them strong!

But grant us weak (as in truth we are.
In our love for them!) they should make us strong:
But do they? Will they? "WOMAN IS WEAK!"
Is the burden still of their song!

Wherein am I weaker than Arthur, pray?
He has, as he should, a sturdier frame,
And he labors early and late for me,
But I—I could do the same!

My hands are willing, my brain is clear,
The world is wide, and the workers few;
But the work of the world belongs to man,
There is nothing for women to do!

Yes, she has the holy duties of home,
A husband to love, and children to bear;
The softer virtues, the social arts—
In short, a life without care!

So our masters say. But what do they know
Of our lives, and feelings, when they are away?
Our household duties, our petty tasks,
The nothings that waste the day?

Nay, what do they care? 'Tis enough for them
That their homes are pleasant: they seek their ease:
One takes a wife to flatter his pride,
Another, to keep his keys!

They say they love us; perhaps they do,
In a masculine way, as they love their wine:
But the soul of a woman needs something more,
Or it suffers at times like mine!

Not that Arthur is ever unkind
In word or deed, for he loves me well;
But I fear he thinks me weak as the rest—
(And I may be, who can tell?)

I should die if he changed, or loved me less,
For I live at best but a restless life:
Yet he may, for they say the kindest men
Grow tired of a sickly wife?

Oh, love me, Arthur! my lord, my life,
If not for my love, and my womanly fears,
At least for your child—But I hear his step—
He must not find me in tears!

A SERMON ON THE SICKLES TRAGEDY.

Rev. Mr. Haley, a Washington preacher, has delivered a sermon on the Sickles Tragedy, which has been copied into the Gold and Conservative National Intelligencer. We make a few extracts. On the causes of the demoralization which is going on around us, he says:

"We have for several years stopped the importation of foreign virtues, and allowed the vices of all nations to come in duty free. Pugilism, the brutality which makes it a peculiar boast that it is 'the noble British art of self-defense,' has become so common that it can support its weekly organs, and some of its champions are clothed in fine linen and fare sumptuously every day—a state of things that suggests a parable, the closing portion of which might not be out of place. From Germany we have introduced large quantities of manufactured articles, which are falsely invoiced 'theology,' but prove, in examination, to be infidelity; and from France we have encouraged the saddest shipments of evils, foremost among them those loose ideas of the marital relations, which have already established it as a decree of the exclusive circles of fashion that it is improper for a married woman to be accompanied to a ball, theatre, or a Church by her own husband. In this latter matter, as is usual with us, we have advanced beyond our teachers; for in France the theory of female training (whatever may be its practical result) is that the young woman, secluded and guarded by her parents during her pupilage, receives such careful discipline that when, upon her marriage, she emerges into society, her moral powers are strong enough to place her above temptation; but we make flirts and coquettes of children; we thrust into the dangerous arena of fashionable life, to contend with wild beasts, girls of fifteen or sixteen; and then, when some startling event causes the hidden fire to gleam out of the mountain's side, we are amazed at the fury of the volcano whose flames we have been feeding, and with some poor bucket-full of pharisaic moralizing we strive to quench it.

WHY OUR WOMEN DO WRONG.

"I do not presume to stand here as a censor of that powerful instrumentality; I know well what are the difficulties it has to encounter, and how much we are indebted to it for the few conservative influences which remain in our social life. I do not intend to employ random or denunciatory terms: I know nothing of the 'venality,' or 'corruption,' or 'unlignity' of the press. I believe American Life owes fully as much to conscientious journalism as to the pulpit; but I can not withhold the suggestion that the American press, in following the example of a newspaper which has made itself the laughing-stock of London by its pompous parade of millinery details on all occasions of Court display, may do much evil by proclaiming and lauding the extravagances of our receptions and balls. Such things have no place in a Democracy; they foster a love of display, and they lead to bankruptcy and dishonor. For the sake of the occasional appearance of ten lines of newspaper comment many a wife has beggared her husband; and the records of eternity only can tell how many foolish women have first heard the tempter's voice in a whisper of notoriety. The devil often comes a garb of silk and jewelry then a form of repulsive criminality. A compassionate yielding, on the part of the press, to a not uncommon request for complimentary notices of a woman's beauty or apparel, may add to the impetus of a descending soul. If my voice could be heard in kindly remonstrance, it should frame, in Scriptoral phraseology, a petition to those who not only record but mould public opinion, 'Help those women!' help them to higher conceptions of life, to nobler ambitions, to braver deeds than now exhaust their lives."

THE MORNING AFTER THE TRAGEDY.

The preacher closed thus: "Let me borrow a leaf from my record of experiences for a closing word. Last Monday Morning during those early hours preceding daybreak, when the stars have a peculiarly glittering appearance, as they seem to rejoice that their night-watch over this sin-laden earth is drawing to a close, I looked into the infinity above me and thought of the history of the preceding twenty-four hours; of the sudden rush of a spirit from the activities of life into the Unseen; of the children who, within a few hours, had become orphans; of one whose future bitterness looked worse than prison bars; of the solitary chamber of desolate grief; and as all the worlds above moved on in their cycle-dance as if there were no crime or woe to arrest even momentary attention, it was as if some penetrating voice called to me from afar and told me how transitory and perishing is all indulgence, all ambition, all worldly maxime and all worldly glory; how, when we have all ended our feverish dream, the eternities will still be glistening without emotion and without change, and to other hearts than ours, will seem to shout from their majestic heights—Mortals, virtue is best!"

ON PROFANE SWEARING.

A writer says: "An oath from a woman's lips is unnatural and incredible. I would as soon expect a bullet from a rosebud.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. NANCY N. WILLIAMS, wife of Robert T. Williams, and daughter of Benjamin and Lucretis Rush of Montgomery county, N. C., was born 28th February, 1820; at about the age of twelve, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and lived a devoted Christian. In 1840 removed to Ouachita parish, La. She lived with her kind and affectionate husband and six children till the 7th day of February, 1859, about 6 o'clock, P. M., when her soul—among many dear friends and weeping children—left its earthly tenement to join her little babe and many departed friends in heaven. I knew her from the time she joined the church up to the moment of her death; was by her when her soul took its flight to heaven. We have often bowed together around the family altar as well as at the house of God, and she always gave the strongest testimony of her acceptance with him; and in the trying hour of death her faith was still stronger. The affability of her manners and the cheerfulness of her disposition rendered her a favorite in the social circle; while her benevolence and unaffected sympathy for others in misfortune and affliction caused her to be much loved by her neighbors, and her death lamented by all who knew her. About fifteen minutes before she died, she was asked: "In whom do you now put your trust?" She answered distinctly, her "hopes were stayed strongly in God!" as she had said several times before. ☞ The S. C. and Memphis Christian Advocate please copy.

MRS. MARY Q. STUCKEY, wife of Robt. H. Stuckey, and daughter of Rev. Samuel S. and Elizabeth C. Belloh; died of pneumonia, in Dale county, Alabama, 2d February, 1859, in her 24th year. The deceased had been a consistent member of the M. E. Church, South, for about twelve years. Seldom has death preyed upon one so good, noble and pure. Her life was short, but of deep Christian piety. She was a great Bible reader and a Christian patern. During her illness she talked much of living faithful in the service of the Lord; had the word of God read to her, and frequently requested that hymns of praise should be sung to His holy name. She died in the triumph of faith; and her freed spirit has gone to bathe in the river of life, to mingle in the blessed throng of angels forever. She left a daughter one year and a half old, and a husband, of whom she was a lovely wife, to mourn her loss.

We sincerely sympathise with our afflicted and bereaved brother, and pray that he may receive that consolation which God alone can give.

MRS. SUSAN A. JONES, wife of Clinton Jones, died near Franklin, in Holmes county, Mississippi, 3d March, in the 39th year of her age. She was born in Franklin county, Tennessee; professed religion and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church when quite young, and continued a zealous member. Her last sickness was short, but her sufferings great—which she bore with a fortitude and patience rarely seen. She manifested during her illness the greatest solicitude for her husband, who was absent from the State, and three of her children who were off at school; her children, that were at home, she called to her bedside and gave them her counsel and blessing. Having been informed that she must die, her reply was that "she was ready to meet her God." In all the relations—wife, mother, step-mother, mistress, and friend—sister Jones shone pre-eminently. The Church has sustained a loss, the neighborhood a loss, but her family the greatest loss of all. May God hear her prayers in their behalf.

J. W.

MRS. LUCY JONES, relict of Mr. Henry Jones, in the eighty second year of her age, died February 28, 1859, at the residence of Mr. S. W. Portis, near Lower Peach Tree, Wilcox county, Alabama. Sister Jones was born 20th November, 1777; was married and moved to Waka county, North Carolloe, in 1808; from thence, with her husband, removed to Clarka county, Alabama, in 1827. About which time she professed faith in Christ, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. Since then she has lived a faithful Christian, exerting a most wholesome influence especially upon the minds of her children and grand-children, most of whom she lived to see converted, and devoted to the cause of God; during her last illness, she spoke of her departure with perfect calmness and resignation, exhorting her children and those around her to fidelity to the cause of the blessed Redeemer, and to meet her in the heavenly world. Thus lived and died an aged mother in Isreal, who, though dead, still lives in the affections of multitudes who have known her long—her end was peace.

PREAMBLE AND RESOLUTIONS, ON THE DEATH OF T. W. HINES.

At the first Quarterly Meeting, for Oktibbeha Circuit, Mississippi Conference, held at Goshen, March 12th, 1859, the following preamble and resolutions, introduced by R. G. Martin, were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, God, in his inscrutable wisdom, has seen fit, on the 18th of February last, to close the earthly career and ministerial labors of Rev. T. W. Hines, who for twelve months has been the Missionary to the colored population on the Oktibbeha Mission, and has been a consistant and worthy member of this body, and gave evidence during his sojourn among us and at the close of his life, of his acceptance with God, therefore

Resolved, That in his death the people of his charge and the Church have been deprived of the bright example and faithful teaching of a pious and devoted minister of the Gospel.

Resolved, That we mourn the loss of our brother.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with his afflicted widow and relatives, in their bereavement; and pray that this dispensation of Providence may be sanctified to their eternal good.

Resolved, That these resolutions be published in the New Orleans Christian Advocate, and that the Secretary be instructed to forward a copy to the family of the deceased.

Children:
TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For The Conservative.]
Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.
DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper; believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the [illegible] of my family Physician.
In the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the round three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.
Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.
These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due in suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.
W. H. VASSAR.

ARMINIANISM AND CALVINISM.

For Whom Christ Died.

Calvinism teaches, that Christ died for the elect, and e elect only: Proof—"Neither are any other redeemed Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified d saved but the elect only." Confession of Faith.

God's word teaches, that Christ died for all: Proof —"For God so loved the world that He gave his only gotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should ot perish but have everlasting life. For God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world, but that e world through him might be saved." John, 3: 16–7. "That He, by the grace of God, should taste eath for every man." Heb. 2: ix. "And He is the ropitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also r the sins of the whole world." I. John, 2: ii.

Calvinism teaches, that God has willed to save none at the elect; that he has fixed by an unchangeable de- ee the exact number that shall be saved, and the xact number that shall be damned. Proof—"By e decree of God, for the manifestation of His ory, some men and angels are predestinated unto ever- sting life, and some fore-ordained to everlasting death. hese angels and men, thus predestinated and fore-or- ained, are particularly and unchangeably designed—and eir number is so certain and definite, that it cannot be ther increased or diminished." Confession of Faith.

God's word teaches, that it is not God's will that any hould perish, but that all should be saved: Proof— I exhort, therefore, that first of all supplications, rayers, intercessions and giving of thanks be made for l men, for kings and for all that are in authority; that e may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness d honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the ght of God our Savior, who will have all men to be ved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. or there is one God, and one mediator between God d men—the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a nsom for all, to be testified in due time." I. Tim., 2: vi. Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? ith the Lord God: And not that he should return from ways and live? For I have no pleasure in the death m that dieth, saith the Lord God; wherefore turn your- ves and live."—"As I live, saith the Lord God, I have pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the icked turn from his way and live. Turn ye—turn ye om your evil ways and live; for why will ye die, O! ouse of Israel?" Ezekiel, 18th chapter and 33d apter.

If Calvinism be true, then sinners thus expostulated ith, and asked "why will ye die?" could very readily have swered—"because some men are fore-ordained to ever- sting death and their number is so certain and definite at it cannot be either increased or diminished."

Calvinism teaches that those who are elected and pre- stinated to eternal life, are elected and predestinated ithout any foresight of faith or good works, or persever- nce in either of them: Proof—"Those of mankind that re predestinated unto life, God, before the foundation f the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable urpose, and secret counsel, (how was the secret discov- red?) and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen in Christ, unto everlasting glory, out of His mere free race and love, without any foresight of faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other hing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him hereunto, and all to the praise of his glorious grace." Confession of Faith.

God's word teaches that repentance, faith, and a holy life are necessary; or, in other words, if we have them ot we cannot be saved: Proof—"I tell you, nay; but xcept ye repent ye shall all likewise perish." Luke 13: iii. For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salva- ion, not to be repented of." Cor., 7: x. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." Mark, 16: xvi. "But without faith it is impossible to please (God)." Heb., 11: vi. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and hou shalt be saved." Acts, 16: xxxi. "Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall ee the Lord." Heb., 12: xiv. "But he that endureth o the end, shall be saved." Matt., 10: xxii. We mere- y quote these texts as specimens of the antagonisms hat exist between the scriptures and Calvinism.

We cannot quote them all, the whole paper would be rowded with such quotations. Christ's Sermon on the Mount is at open war with Calvinism.

Calvinism teaches, in regard to those that are finally ost, that "God was pleased, for the glory of his sovereign ower over his creatures, to pass by and to ordain them o dishonor and wrath, for their sins." Confession of aith. No wonder it is immediately added that, "The doctrine of this high mystery of predestination is to be handled with special prudence and care"—with gloves, we suppose, for surely it will not bear handling in any other way. What says the word of God about those that are lost? "And ye will not come to me that ye might have life." John 5: xl. "How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing, and ye would not." Matt., 23: xxxvii. "He beheld the city and wept over it." Luke, 19: xli.

MANNERS IN THE PULPIT.

Much has been said upon this subject, and well said; but if existing evils are to be remedied, much yet remains to be said and done. It is a subject of vastly more importance to the Church and the world than seems to be generally conceded; for, a little reflection will satisfy any intelligent mind, that bad manners in the pulpit go very far to defeat preaching, and prevent the proper results of the gospel. It is marvellous, that with as clearly developed results before the mind, as this case presents, so few should profit by what all observing men see, and admit. Many a minister deports himself with so little propriety in the sacred desk—so violates all the dictates of nature, that all persons of taste and correct perception, require a large amount of the spirit of piety to enable them to rise above it.

They are compelled to close their eyes, turn away their faces so that they may not see the speaker, or give up all idea of being profited by the service. Their struggle is, so to suppress their dislikes arising from the offence given, as to pass through the hour and not commit sin! And this in the place of being "fed by the sincere milk of the word!" How often do we hear good people say, "I determined that I would not let his bad manner disturb me, and so I prayed with all my might while he was preaching;" or, "I shut my eyes and tried to forget the manner, and think only of the matter." And again, "what he said was well enough, but his manner spoiled it all." What a pity, that a man professing to be called of God to preach, should so unnecessarily throw hindrances in his own way, and defeat his own success! What a pity that pious, praying people should in so many instances be robbed of the benefits of preaching and the gospel, by improprieties in the pulpit. It takes a high degree of grace, not to be injured by a great deal of preaching!

But many will say—and among them the offenders themselves—"men have no right to attach so much importance to the manner." They have. They cannot help it. A violation of good taste, in the pulpit as elsewhere, is a violation of nature—a sin against principles and perceptions which have their origin with God; and men must outrage all their instincts and the very natures God has given them, as well as resist the dictates of religion itself, not to disapprove of the improprieties in question. All they ask—and they have a right to claim this—is that the speaker be natural in manner and voice. They ask not for anything constrained or artificial—for anything studied; but just the opposite; that the speaker will simply talk to them with grave and becoming manners. And have they not a right to this!

Instead of this, how often do they have to witness antics, fantastics and unmanosbies, unbecoming a grave man any where, much less in the sacred desk; and to listen to screams and bellowings that put to flight every feeling of devotion, and sometimes even gravity itself. These things are done under the profession of zeal for God and souls, but they simply evince a want of true, intelligent zeal. Zeal for God is earnest, but tender and cautious. It fears to sin by excesses and improprieties, as much as by deficiencies. It knows very well that success is not found in "godly tones," or godly howlings. If preachers could but realize how much is lost to the gospel and souls by pulpit improprieties, they would feel as much bound to reform, as they do to say their prayers. It was the impressive direction given to young ministers, by one of the masters of pulpit proprieties and pulpit success—"talk to the people." The most effective man, for his talents, that I know in the country, is the most simple natural speaker. He stands calmly before the audience—leans over the desk towards them—and speaks with the tones and manner in which he would address an infant class in a Sabbath-school. Every body listens, is pleased—and weeps. I have known the highest men in the Church, so wrought upon, that they could hardly contain themselves. The writer has been shaken like the aspen leaf under his simple "talk."

I am not prescribing any particular tone or volume of voice. It may be loud or soft, but let it be natural. I would be the last man to confine the occupant of the desk within the iron limits of a stiff, or fastidious propriety. I would allow him, nay I insist upon his having, ease and naturalness; then, I fear little else.

I have already written enough to offend a whole generation of "Furloses," if they read it; and will close by relating an incident of recent occurrence, which goes to show, that whatever may be men's practice, all admit the truth of my allegations. Upon a recent occasion I heard two brethren preach the same day, and in the same Church, whom I will designate as Bros. A. and B. The manner of both was objectionable, to some extent, but that of B. much the more so. When the services of the day were over, as A. and B. had never heard each other before, a brother minister said to A., "how were you pleased with the sermon to-day." "Well there were good things in it," was the reply, "but his manner nearly spoiled it all. Why do you not take him aside and talk to him, and point out his faults, and cure him?" The same brother meeting B. soon after, inquired of him, "how did you like brother A?" "I objected to some things he said," was the response, "but on the whole it was very good; but his manner injured it very much!" Now these brethren were neither envious nor jealous, but they both saw the faulty manner of the other—though I think in one case there was a want of just appreciation—and yet each will persist in his own. One of these brethren jerked and slung the Bible about, twirled and fumbled its leaves, as though it had been guilty of some grave offence, and went through with such outre movements, as upset the gravity of some of the audience, and thus hindered the effect of his sermon. Thus we preach for the conversion of men, and counteract the gospel by pulpit improprieties.

A SUFFERER.

THE GOLDEN CENSER.

By Bishop Andrew,

Prayer is essential to the Christian life. Good people always pray; and people who pray regularly are very apt to be good. The duty and privilege of prayer enters into the very essence and spirit of the Christian life. It brings us into communion, close and sweet, with God, our Heavenly Father. And by means of prayer, properly offered up to God, in the name of Jesus, and under the influence of the Holy Ghost, there is a constant communication maintained between the Christian's soul and God. The ladder of the wandering patriarch's dream, well and beautifully illustrates this constant intercourse between earth and heaven.

Man is needy, weak, ignorant, guilty; and if he is to know an hour of calm and settled peace and confidence, he must seek it in some higher sphere than earth. The all-wise God, the Maker of all things, invites him to approach the throne of the heavenly grace; there is the mercy-seat—there the blood of sprinkling calls him to come and be washed from the stains of guilt, and pledges the truth and love and faithfulness of God for the sinner's acceptance, and the witness of the glorious fact in his own consciousness, by the Holy Ghost.

Nor are we limited as to the privilege of approach to God. Every hour—every moment—the door of mercy's temple stands open, and we can approach with confidence; nothing being required to recommend us but a deep sense of want, and an ardent and all-pervading desire to receive the boon we ask, and an humble and firm reliance on the atonement of Calvary, and God's word of promise to us. We can pray always and anywhere. When head and hands are necessarily busy about the legitimate business of life, the heart can talk with God.

A great many people reject the blessings of prayer, because they cannot understand the manner in which prayer can move God, or influence him to act in any case. They say, God knows what I need as well before I ask Him as he does afterwards—can He not, therefore, send me the good I need, just as well without my prayers as with them? God could, no doubt, do so; but in His infinite wisdom and love, he has seen it best to make this asking of Him what we need the condition and test of our acceptance with Him, and the attainment of those good things for which we ask. Without we ask we receive not; refusing to ask, we perish for luck of those very things which we have refused to ask. Nor is this course of things novel in God's procedure with us. Suppose we say, God knows what provisions I need for myself and household—He is able to give them to me—and, therefore, 'tis unphilosophical for me to plow or sow or reap; all comes from God at last, and it is wise, therefore, just to leave every thing with Him. Should you reason thus, who would applaud your wisdom?

The sum of the whole matter is just this: We are God's properly, having been bought with a price. We have sinned against God. He, alone, has the right to prescribe the conditions upon which we can approach Him acceptably; and He, for reasons of infinite wisdom and kindness, has declared that He will be sought unto for those things; and, that in reference to our bodily support, we shall work. It is folly, therefore, to seek for difficulties, in either case—it is only wise to pray for the one—and to work and pray, both, for the other.

Although it is our privilege to pray at all times mentally, yet mental prayer alone will not suffice when we have the opportunity of bowing formally before God—in secret, or in the family, or in the social circle. The holy men of old had their set hours for private communion with God. We find David frequently referring to this in the Psalms; and in the noble example of Daniel we have this same fact most impressively taught to us.

The truth is, that the worship of God should be conducted on regularly established principles. There should be order and method in its performance; hence days and seasons have ever been set apart and consecrated to the peculiar services of religion; and hence, too, the devotion of the heart always seeks to clothe its confessions, its repentance, its thanksgivings and its supplications in appropriate words, and to connect with these services all the forms of habit. And I think it would be found, upon close inspection, that those who do not kneel in secret before their God, and that too according to a regular plan, will not be apt long to continue the practice of mental prayer. The one helps the other; and neither will be apt to continue long without the other. Now, we are aware that a great many clever people neglect family and social prayer, on the ground that they have not the necessary gifts. I think that this objection will be found, upon close examination, to be more specious than solid; but if it be true, as alleged, this does not excuse from the duty. If you are devoid of the necessary gifts, or if you are too diffident to attempt extemporaneous prayer, there are many excellent manuals of devotion which will enable you to perform the important and delightful duty of family prayer, with comfort to yourself and benefit to your family. I exhort you, by all means, to procure one of these and use it, morning and evening, in your family. It does not by any means follow, that because the prayer is read it is not devotionally presented to God. Much as I should deprecate the making forms of prayer indispensable, yet I confess to a very strong persuasion that the possession of a well selected manual of prayer, and its frequent study, and sometimes its frequent use, might be greatly beneficial to a great many of us. While Mr. Wesley used and recommended extemporaneous prayer among his people, yet it is known that he prepared suitable forms of prayer, which he recommended to his societies; and by the early Methodists, both in this country and England, they were extensively used—and continue to be still in England. In America, we have learned to dispense to a large extent with forms. Whether we have acted altogether wisely in this thing, I shall not decide.

But I am making a long article, where I only intended a short notice. The Rev. Dr. Summers has lately sent forth a beautiful little book, intended to aid the devotions of the pious in the closet, in the family, and in public. I have read this little book, the "Golden Censer," with unmingled pleasure. The tone of its piety is scriptural and deep. The prayers are in great variety; selected from the best sources; breathing the right spirit, embodied in the right words for approaching the mercy-seat of God. And even if you do not choose to use them in your public devotions, the frequent reading of them can hardly fail to improve both the tone of your piety and the character of your prayers. The forms of prayer are accompanied with most appropriate and beautiful hymns. I earnestly recommend this little book both to preachers and people, and hope it will find its way, and a cordial welcome, into all the families of our Israel.

A REMINISCENCE OF THE REVOLUTION.

MR. AND MRS. TRAMMELL AND THE TORY SERGEANT.

Mr. Editor: My appointment on last Saturday and Sunday, was at Emory Chapel in the Lafayette Circuit. Arriving at the place some time before the hour for preaching, I took a walk through the little grave-yard; and, stopping to read the inscription upon an humble tombstone, I recognized in the name and age, that there slept the remains of our worthy friend, and "Mother in Israel," Mary Trammell, whose funeral I had preached some eight years ago, while several incidents, some of thrilling interest, connected with the history of herself and husband, came up in my memory, and thinking that they might be of interest to yourself and many of the readers of your excellent paper, I have concluded to furnish some of them for your columns.

She died, I think, in the 94th year of her age. She was old enough hence to be familiar with many of the bloody scenes which occurred near the close of the Revolutionary war, in the immediate neighborhood of her home, which was near King's Mountain, in South Carolina. Her husband, Thomas Trammell, had unhesitatingly identified his fortunes with the "liberty party," as as they were familiarly called; and, being a good shot and of unflinching courage, was a terror to the friends of the king, as far as his name was known. At the time of which we write, that section of country was overrun by the "tory party," who were encamped in large numbers under Gen. Ferguson at King's Mountain. The Gen. had in his command a noted tory by the name of John Towns, who had long been the neighbor and professed friend of Trammell.

At this time, however, he was not only a tory, but was honored with the rank of sergeant, and was constantly upon the scout for the purpose of capturing men and horses, etc. Young T. could not feel much afraid, somehow, of Towns. He thought, "Surely he will not hurt me." But in this he was mistaken, as he afterward had occasion painfully to learn. He had been for some time hiding and keeping out of the way as best he could, till one night he ventured to sleep in his house, when, just before day, they were aroused by the heavy tramp of horses, and on rising from bed he found the house quite surrounded by a troop, which proved to be Sergeant Towns and his band. Poor Trammell was at once seized, bound, and carried out into the yard to be shot. Towns produced his authority, executed in due form, with the signature of King George affixed, and flourishing it over Trammell's head, pompously offered him his freedom upon the condition of his taking the oath of allegiance to the king, and taking up arms against his countrymen; which proposition he treated with merited scorn; and said in reply, "you can carry me bound to the king's army, but you can never make me fight against my countrymen." After some consultation, they concluded to try and get hold of some of Trammell's horses, (knowing he had some valuable ones hid out) and they knew not how to get them without using him as a guide, for they were at large in the range; and so anxious were they to get them that they finally released him upon the condition that he would go and drive them up. He went and found them, but rode and drove them another way. After waiting till all hope of his return was gone, eating, drinking, and pillaging every thing they could turn to account, and feeling no little chagrin at their disappointment, Sergeant Towns called on Mrs. Trammell for some clothes for his men, something to manufacture clothes of, and she replied, "Sir you have already stripped me of all; I have nothing more for you, except your nephew there," pointing to his sisters son—an orphan boy, that they had in charity taken some time before, to keep him from suffering. "He has a few clothes which I have made for him; you can take them if you will." But they did not suit. About that time he fixed his eye upon a strong box, which sat near the fire-place, and said, "what have you in that box?" She replied indignantly, "Sir, that's none of your business." "Well," said he, "it is my business, and I'll see." "No sir," said she, "you wont see," and seizing a heavy iron poker, she stepped between him and the box, and planted herself firmly. She resolved to defend her little treasure. It contained a few quilts, and counterpanes, the work of her own hands. Towns advanced and drew his sword, to intimidate her, but she maintained her position, and he would present his sword, and menacingly say, "now would you hit a fellow?" She said, "do you advance another step, and you will see," and he positively cowered, and left her in possession of her little hard earned treasure.

But my letter is already too long, and I have several other things to say which I must reserve for another letter.

WHO WILL ANSWER?

Mr. Editor: I wish to ask a question, through the medium of your columns, and shall be glad if you, or some of your readers, will give it an intelligent answer.

What importance is to be attached, and what regard paid, to the dying requests of departed friends?

For instance, a husband or wife is near death; the light of eternity is breaking upon them; and life and the world, with all their transactions, appear in a new and solemn light. The surviving companion is called to the bed-side and earnestly requested to do, or not to do, certain things of a moral and religious character. What regard are such requests entitled to?

Or a parent is about to die. The eternal interests of the children, about to be left behind, press heavily upon the departing spirit; the former course of indulgence and gratification is now seen and felt to be wrong—and the child is called to the departing one, and requested to promise that it will not pursue the course of youthful folly and indulgence any longer. The promise is made. Now, ought the surviving parent to urge upon the child solemnly to keep the pledge, thus given, or not? Does he or she commit a wrong against the soul of that child by allowing it to disregard that pledge? Is there anything more binding in a promise thus given, than in those made under ordinary circumstances?

ONE INTERESTED.

TOPICS OF THE TIME.

THE TROUBLE ON THE DANUBE.—Attention has been so occupied with the Italian difficulties which threaten the peace of Europe, that the complications in the Danubian Provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia, have been almost overlooked. We condense from the Picayune.

The Russian war sprung out of the anomalous position of these provinces; a Christian population, subject to the Mahommedan rule, yet having certain rights of quasi-independence, of which Russia undertook to be the protector, as means of approach to the mastery of Constantinople. When the war ended, the settlement of the future government of the Provinces was one of the topics which elicited the widest diversity of opinion among the parties to the treaty of Paris, and a conclusion was only arrived at by the concession of extreme views. The views of one party were for a union of the two Principalities under one executive head, creating a single State, to which the local legislature of each should be subordinate. The other was for the complete separation of the two into States entirely independent of each other. The unionists, consisting of France and Russia, had political reasons for preferring a consolidated government. Austria, and to some extent England, were for the preservation, in some form, of the individuality of the States and their independence of each other.

What was agreed upon was a mixed Government, containing some of the elements of a federal union. They received the title of "The United Provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia"—were to have a common flag—a joint commission of sixteen, eight from each Province, in the nature of a Senate and a common Court of Appeal in judicial cases. But they were to have, each its own Hospodar—its own Legislative Assembly—its own courts—a separate ministry and separate finances. The legislative power was to be exercised in each State by the Hospodar, the Assembly, and the Central Commission or Senate. Each Hospodar was to have nearly the power of a constitutional monarch, being elected for life, with power to appoint ministers, magistrates, all public officers, appoint the resident, name four of the sixteen Central Commissioners. Each State was to have its own military organization, but it was to be the same in both States, and subject to be united into one army, at the discretion of the two Hospodars.

Col. Couza has been chosen Hospodar of Moldavia and Hospodar of Wallachia—and the precautions of the Paris Convention against the consolidation of the two States are frustrated. One man unites the civil list of the two, the army of the two, appoints the Constantinople agent for each, and may appoint the same person, appoints one half of the central commission, namely: four as Hospodar of Moldavia, and four as Hospodar of Wallachia.

Col. Couza is now, in spite of the declared policy and purposes of Austria, in which she was befriended by England, the sole executive of the Rouman States, practically consolidated. The new chief has taken a further step of convoking the legislatures of the two provinces together, and thus decreeing a legislative union. There is nothing in the text of the convention to prevent him from appointing the same ministry for both.

Russian and French diplomacy has thus accomplished the substance it vainly strove for in the Congress of Paris, and yet it has not literally departed from the text of the treaty. Everything is in form, as permitted or enjoined by that instrument; everything has been done by the separate action within legal bounds; and yet, by concurrent action of the two States, they are all but consolidated into one.

Austria resents and is indignant, and Turkey shares her resentment, and each has an army advancing to the frontier to menace the double headed executive. But by the text of the treaty, none of the powers can make an armed interference without the consent of the other, or a majority of them, and if Austria moves, she breaks the treaty and makes a casus belli. She has been outwitted and defeated, and there does not seem to be any remedy, for her short of war, and to that there are great obstacles, in the interpretation of treaties, which her rivals insist upon.

THE AFFAIRS OF THE POSTOFFICE DEPARTMENT.—Later from Mr. Toucey.—March 22.—In reply to a note of George Mattingly, the Postmaster General informs him that Congress has, for the first time since the organization of the Government, failed to make provision for the Department, and all the members of the next Congress been elected, the President might, on the 4th of March, have called an extra session, and the omissions of the late Congress been supplied, but it was impossible to do so without disfranchising fifteen of these sovereign States. This was most unfortunate. There ought to be no time when a full Congress could not be convened, and it is firmly hoped that such a state of affairs may never again occur. Had the bill which failed to pass, made provision only for the fiscal year, commencing on the first of July, there would have been obviously no necessity for an extra session.

The deficiency on the 30th of June next will amount to $1,385,381, nearly $750,000 of which being an unpaid balance accumulating on the 31st of December and the 28th of February, and which can and will be paid by the Department within sixty days from this date. The payment of the principal part will be made in thirty days. The Postmaster General makes other statements to show that it would be impossible to convene Congress in time to meet the great bulk of the responsibilities, without virtually excluding from Congress the representatives of the several sovereign States. In the judgment of the President the lesser evil was to wait till the first Monday in December, when all the States will be fully represented. After the amounts due shall be ascertained, they become debts which must be paid. On this, contractors, if they desire, can borrow money. The lender could have no better security.

Provision should also be made for the payment of the interest, which would amount to not less than $100,000. A system of retrenchment, so far as practicable, is now an imperative duty. By the act of 1858, Congress established six hundred and ninety-five new post routes, the service of which includes the St. Paul's and Puget Sound route, established in 1855, but not yet in operation. It has been estimated that there would be required an annual appropriation of 604,488 over and above the receipts accruing therefrom. Not a dollar has been appropriated for this purpose, and as a consequence, though the contracts for these routes have been advertised and proposals received, they cannot be put in operation until the provision is made by law for that purpose.

THE NEXT PRESIDENCY, of course, is one of the topics of increasing interest. While we express no opinions of our own, nor endorse those of others, our readers will be interested by the following hitting off of the prominent candidates by the Crescent:

The Republican very summarily, and very justly in our opinion, disposes of the pretensions Gen. Jo. Lane, once of Indiana and now of Oregon. Gen. Jo. is a very good rough fighter, and possesses, withal, excellent qualities of head and heart; but he is no more fitted for the Presidency than a Caimanche Indian. Well may our St. Louis contemporary say, "If the Democratic party is reduced to any such shifts, the sooner it goes into liquidation the better."

As for Mr. Breckinridge, we think the Republican disposes of him with too little consideration. If he was old enough to be elected Vice-President in 1856, he will certainly not be too young to fill the Presidential chair in 1861. As for Judge Douglas, we have no doubt, and never had any doubt, but that his name would be brought before the Charleston Convention. Furthermore, we believe that he is the only man in the Union, above Mason's and Dixon's line, who can be elected over Seward, or a more objectionable free-soil candidate. As for Hunter and Wise, well—the one is too slow and the other too fast. Neither will succeed. And as for Gen. Sam Houston, we don't think he will be able to obtain a single Southern vote in the National Convention.

The Cincinnati Enquirer and the St. Louis Republican, in common with many other President-making journals, seem to lose sight of the most formidable candidate before the Charlestan Convention for the next Presidency. The name of the gentleman is John Slidell, of the State of Louisiana. For fertility and wealth on the one side, and unparalelled powers of shrewdness, tact and management on the other, we will back our State and our man against all creation.

MILITARY FORCE OF EUROPE.—The Commercial Union, of Antwerp, has the following statistics of the military and naval forces of the different States of the Continent of Europe. The figures which this journal publishes, without being official, appear to be taken from reliable sources:

SENATOR TOOMBS said in a speech: "Your appropriations for navy-yards have gone to the building of houses for officers, and the making of flower-pots, and all that sort of thing, at the cost of $2,000,000; and it will be no less as long as you pay it, but will go up to $4,000,000, if you do not stop it. There are $2,000,000 that you have no need for at all. You have 8,000 sailors to man your navy. You have not increased them of late years, and you have now 8,000 men in your navy yards to help them—civilians. You have carried their number up from 3,000 to 8,000. You have eight navy-yards. England has 550 ships, and she has two navy-yards. You have sight conveniently located all about the country, and it is a cause of reproach to good Democrats for the enemy to say we keep people there to cheat them in elections; and, as God is my judge, I am afraid there is something in it!

THE SICKLES TRAGEDY.—The killing of Philip Barton Key, by the Hon. Daniel E. Sickles, for the seduction of Mrs. Sickles, in the most mournful case of the kind, and has produced the deepest and most wide-spread sensation that has occurred in many years. Key and Sickles were both distinguished men, and Mrs. Sickles pre-eminently beautiful and amiable. Murder is murder—and a most awful crime. But the injury done Mr. Sickles in the greatest known to man—next to eternal damnation—and one which is hopelessly without redress. In has done all man a service, in ridding society of one of the foulest fiends that can take the human shape, and he will have the sympathy of all. But—he has committed murder—as justifiable, however, as killing in self-defence.

THE DEATH OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL BROWN is known throughout the country. At the funeral service, at Washington, at which the dignitaries of Church and State assisted, the eloquent young pastor of our church there, Rev. John C. Granberry, delivered the discourse—a report of which has been sent us. Dr. Summers took part in the funeral service at Nashville. Gov. Brown was the son of a Methodist preacher. It is believed that his anxiety about the Postoffice Appropriation bill hastened his death. He was a laborious and eminent lawyer, not devoted to politics. He was the author of the Baltimore Democratic Platform.

GENERAL MIRABEAU B. LAMAR.—Paragraphs derogatory to the moral character of this distinguished man, who is our present minister to Nicaragua, are afloat in the newspapers. He is charged with habitual drunkenness: "If these reports are well founded," says the Pacific Methodist, "a sad change has come over the gifted and chivalrous Lamar, within a few years. As a scholar, a soldier, a poet and an orator, his well-earned fame was sullied by no stain of personal vice or dishonor."

We will add that if they are true, the change has occurred since he left Texas for his post—which we do not believe.

PRESCOTT THE HISTORIAN.—The tribute of respect and praise rendered by the leading English journals to the memory and merits of Prescott, the historian, so lately removed from among us, is very gratifying for many reasons; but chiefly as showing that on the broad neutral-ground of literature, America and England can, and do, meet without prejudice, passion, or any but the most kindly and catholic feelings. The English journals last received by us contain biographical notices, written with great admiration—we might say with great affection. The Times and Daily News, Globe and Sun, Star and Telegraph, Herald and Chronicle, Athenæum and Critic all unite in this tribute. Illustrated News of the World gives a page portrait with a memoir, and the Illustrated London News announces one for its issue of March 5th. The homage is at once general and genuine.

WASHINGTON SOCIETY.—A Washington letter-writer, in one of the New York papers, makes a sensible distinction, which some of the gossiping scribblers forget, between the permanent and transient population of Washington. He says: "In Washington there are two distinct sets of people; the one set consists of those who are permanent residents, irrespective of any of the public offices; a sedate, sober, virtuous and Christian population as is to be found in any city of the land. The other is the transient population, on many of whom there is little restraint, and over whom there is often a slender dominion of principle. Most of the brawls and public disgraces are caused by this latter class."

CHASED BY A GRIZZLY BEAR.

By a Colonel in the United States Army.

SOME sixteen years ago I had command of an expedition to Oregon, partly for purposes of exploration, and partly to negotiate certain matters with some of the far western tribes. I had attached to my company several Indians, among whom was a Cherokee of unequaled skill in woodcraft, of great prowess, and a perfectly dead shot under almost any circumstances, who became my devoted friend, and whose friendship I cordially reciprocated.

On coming in sight of the Rocky Mountains, I one morning rode from the camp alone, and proceeded to explore a ledge of hills up which a wide path gradually wound, which occasionally narrowed to a few feet as it swept round a curve. I finally came to an elevated level space, a portion of which was covered by a thick growth of stunted trees. Here I reined up my horse, and sat for some time admiring the landscape, until I was suddenly startled by the sound of crashing twigs and saplings in a neighboring grove; and turning my head in that direction, while I sat in my saddle, I saw an enormous and terrible animal just breaking cover and moving towards me. I had been but little accustomed to the forests, but I had heard enough of the wild beasts which inhabit the Rocky Mountains, to believe that this must be a grizzly bear. His form, size and color all corresponded with the descriptions of that most powerful and savage of our native animals; and the long, white tusks which projected from his mouth gave him an aspect more terrible than I had ever conceived. I instantly raised my rifle and fired at him; the next instant rousing my horse to his speed, and guiding him back to the path. Down the hill he went, apparently as much under the influence of fear as of my spurs. Knowing his pursuer, I felt at first no apprehensions, unless from some unforeseen accident. But on looking back, I found, with a shudder of horror, that the bear was not only in full pursuit, but perceptibly gaining on us. I now began to realize my folly in entering the mountains without companions, provision for defense, or even without asking information.

Oh, had I but brought my faithful Cherokee! Or had I not been so hasty as to leave the camp without his knowledge. I looked back again, and the horrid beast was close behind me, and just ready, I thought, to seize me by one bound. But he stopped, for the purpose, as it appeared, of raising himself to an upright posture, in order to strike me with his fore paws. Happy it was for me that such was his way of proceeding. If he had a particle of the cat-kind in his breed, or if he had not been formed on quite a different plan from most other beasts of prey, there would have been no hope for me. I instantly discovered his object, on seeing him stop and throw himself back upon his hind feet, and never did my heels drive in the spurs with such vigor before as at that moment. My horse felt them, and fairly flew. Such a spring I had never known even him to make. If there had been any defect in the girths, I am sure he would have leaped out of the saddle, and left me under the feet of the bear. But all held tight, and away I went, with my faithful steed, like lightning, down the descending path. Not too swiftly, however, for my pursuer. How it was possible for an animal of such a lumbering appearance to get over the ground faster than my favorite and boasted horse, I never yet could understand; but, when I again looked behind, he was once more close upon us; and, in spite of most desperate efforts, again arrived at what he thought striking distance. I watched the moment—again he came to a stand, and began to rise; the spurs again performed their duty, even perhaps more promptly than before; and in one second I seemed to be fifty feet in advance of the enemy. But on he came again; again I avoided him; still he rallied, and renewed the chase. I cast a desperate glance down the remaining declivity, and then upon the plain below, trying to decide upon some way or plan for escape. But which way could I retreat, and what defense could I make, with no weapon but an empty rifle? Just then a bright red spot caught my attention at the foot of the hill, apparently among the prairie-grass, on the border of the plain. The sun was shining on the scarlet ornament worn by my noble Cherokee! Learning that I had left the camp alone, he had hastened to seek me, following my tracks; and, while on the way, had heard the report of my rifle. Galloping on, he had just reached the foot of the hill, and now was standing a little aside from the path, with his rifle leveled, and every nerve and muscle braced up for a sure shot, for the rescue of my life.

My path led along the brow of a steep slope, at the bottom of which flowed the stream. At the same time it formed a gradual curve, which exposed it more distinctly to the view of a person standing at the foot, especially in that part which I was traversing. My Cherokee had instinctively comprehended everything at a glance, and therefore hasten to take his stand at a point from which I should be placed as far as possible out of the range of his intended shot at my pursuer. He had to wait but a moment to allow the beast to present himself as a fair mark, without any intervening tree, rock, or other obstacle; but that moment allowed the bear once more to gain upon me fearfully. I looked back again upon my pursuer, without a ray of hope from the interference of my Indian friend at that juncture, thinking only that, if I could join him he might in some way perhaps show me how to retreat. The beast was again almost upon my horse's haunches, when once more he suddenly stopped; but it was not to rise again. He fell heavily on one side, and the sharp report of a rifle striking my ear at the same instant told me the welcome cause. With unerring aim my Cherokee had hit his left shoulder with his bullet, while the leg was in the air, and so far broke the bone, that, when the weight of the animal came down forcibly upon the limb, it bent and failed under the weight, and struck the ground like a rock. Nor was this all. A narrow was the path, and so far was he thrown aside, the bulk of his body fell beyond the verge; and, quite helpless, he began to roll downward. So steep was the declivity, and at the same time so smooth, having no tree, bush, rock, or irregularity of surface to oppose the passage of such a body, that the bear rolled over and over many times, and stopped not for a moment until he reached the bottom—when plunging into the stream below, he was seen no more.

ENDOWMENT OF THE PUBLISHING-HOUSE.

Our readers—who are all doubtless as deeply interested as ourselves in the success of the movement to endow the Publishing-house—will be encouraged to see by the letters below that the good work is moving forward. Alabama first proposed this endowment, and she is nobly working for its accomplishment. Drs. Hamilton and Neely are both engaged in the enterprise, and this is but one instance of success in calling forth the liberality of their noble-hearted constituency. We publish this item of Dr. Neely's agency with high satisfaction, and hope to chronicle more of the same sort from both the Agents. We congratulate our old friend, Dr. Winn, upon his possession of the grace—"the power to will and to do"—in so good a cause. Would that many others might exercise the same grace—it hath already appeared unto them.

The Alabama Conference has adopted the "Plan" for Conference Depositories straight out, and is working it with all her might. Other Conferences have declined it. But all should, and no doubt will, in their own way, work for the accomplishment of the same end. They differ as to modes and instrumentalities, but harmonize in spirit and aim. All should remember, however, that the $300,000 cash capital for the Publishing House should be raised as soon as possible.

In this connection, we wish to call attention again to Dr. Taylor's mission. He, as Sunday-school Secretary, is striving to raise $100,000 for a Sunday-school Publication Fund. A gentleman has recently given him $1000. We do earnestly recommend this enterprise, also, to the consideration of our friends who have the means. These two things accomplished, and our Book Agent can give us all the publications, of every sort, that we need, and at the lowest prices.

DEAR BROTHER GILLESPIE: At the request of Rev. Dr. Neely, I send you a copy of Dr. P. C. Winn's letter for publication in the New Orleans Christian Advocate, Bro. Neely has been very ill, and is now too much indisposed to attend to it. You will therefore give it an insertion in the paper, and accept this apology for not hearing from Dr. N. himself, who would have written several days ago but for the reason above stated. THOS. W. DORMAN.

Green County, Alabama, March 1859.

REV. P. P. NEELY, D. D.

DEAR BROTHER: In view of the uncertainty of this fleeting and transitory life, I have ever since I have had a family, made it a rule to keep a will by me at all times, giving my property such disposition as I desired it to take after my death; and you may remember that, in a conversation with you last summer, in reference to the endowment of the Publishing-house of the Southern Methodist Church, I stated that it was my intention to bequeath to the Church, at my death, ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS to be kept at perpetual interest for the gratuitous distribution of tracts and books among the poor and destitute; and I address you this note to inform you, that, so far as regards that item of my will, I have concluded to become my own executor, and to request you, as the agent of the Publishing house, and Book Depository of the Alabama Conference to call on me for that amount.

Except the preaching of the Gospel itself, by a living and holy ministry, this endowment enterprise, in my opinion is the most important interest of the Church, and one that comes with a thrilling and importunate appeal to the heart of Christian benevolence. I regret that I am not able to give more to so good a cause, and am yet grateful and happy to be able to make this small deposit into the treasury of the Church for the benefit of God's poor and destitute ones; and, I do assure you, no act of my life has afforded more pleasure than this—becoming the executor of my own will, in reference to this important enterprise. Permit me, my dear brother, through you, to ask the prayers of the Church for the blessing of God upon this humble offering to the cause of Christian charity, and upon your unworthy friend and brother,

P. C. WINN.

The foregoing letter was not designed for publication, but Dr. Neely obtained permission of Dr. Winn to dispose of it as he thought proper; and, believing it would do good, and might possibly incite others to become their own executors in matters of benevolence—in a word, to give and yet live—induced its publication. T. W. D.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVERSIONS.

A Startlingly Instructive Fact.

The Northern Methodist Church, during the past year, has been blessed with an unusually large increase in membership—amounting to more than the membership of several of the old and strong Christian denominations. And yet eighty-five per cent of the conversions were in the Sabbath-schools! Sabbath-school labor resulted in eighty-five conversions, where pulpit labor resulted in fifteen! This is a startlingly instructive fact.

Pious Sunday-school teachers will be refreshed and encouraged by it, to strive still more earnestly for the salvation of the souls of their scholars. Unconverted, or backsliding, or cold-hearted teachers—and there are too many—will be made to feel that they should be fitted for their vocation, or retire. Christian men and women who, from indolence, or other invalid causes, have allowed themselves to neglect the Sunday-schools, will feel that they have sinned in not engaging with all their might in a work at once so easy, so pleasant, and so promising. The unwillingness to rise an hour earlier, and to walk a short distance on Sunday morning, is at this moment preventing thousands of Christians from being the instruments of tens of thousands of conversions. Christian ministers and people will be encouraged to establish and support Sunday-schools wherever they can do so. The whole Church will be encouraged to pray, and give their money and influence, for the success of the the Sunday-school cause. Parents who neglect to send their children to Sunday-school, will be encouraged to send them at once. Sunday-school children will be induced to pray for a revival in their respective schools. And ministers will inquire why their ministry is productive of such a small per cent. of conversions. So may it be!

MEMORIALS AND REMINISCENCES.

In addition to those published already, Rev. G. F. Thompson sends another request, that Rev. J. G. Jones continue his account of the "Introduction of Protestantism into Mississippi," adding that they are read with great interest in his region. Mr. Jones intimates, in a recent letter to this paper, that he purposes further labors in this interesting field, as soon as practicable. He must have time, however, both on account of his other duties, and for the sake of that thorough preparation, without which nothing aspiring to historical accuracy and importance should be published. While we invite, therefore, the contribution of all such matter as can be obtained, we beg to remind writers that great pains should be taken, to be well furnished with materials, and that the articles should be written in the best style possible. Mr. Jones has evidently followed this rule. A better style than his, for such contributions, is hard to find. Simple, direct, careful—he is accurate without undue elaborateness, abounding in incidents without prolixity—and never causes the movement necessary both to the interest and the truth of history.

From Col. Claiborne, Dr. Drake, Rev. W. H. Watkins, and some others, we have the promises of similar contributions, which, we doubt not, will be read with interest and profit.

THE HOUSEHOLD CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE has now the cordial support of the Baltimore East, as well as that of the Baltimore Conference.

NORTHERN METHODIST REFORM.

THE Christian Advocate and Journal advocates—preparatory to the next General Conference—lay-representation—changing the time of the General Conference from May to November—the increase of the episcopacy, by the election of three new bishops, one of the Pacific, and one from among the Germans—and the reform of the presiding eldership. The last, however, he wishes postponed till the General Conference of 1864. On this subject he says: "On this question our readers know thoroughly our personal opinion, and know that it is in favor of a modification of the presiding eldership. We cannot see (though we once thought otherwise) why the Wesleyan plan, successfully operating all along our Northern border, among our Canadian brethren, could not be safely attempted by us; at least we think the choice of stationed or traveling presiding elders might safely be left to the Annual Conferences. Some of them need the latter, and may for years; others do not, and some perhaps need both, according to the wants of different sections of their territory. But we propose not to urge this "reform" now, for good reasons."

On the slavery question, he is guarded. In an article on another subject, he incidentally says: "While slavery was raging within our Church, invading the ministry in the South and encroaching even upon the episcopacy, we, with all the old-school abolitionists, fought against it with whatever might we had, as editor of Zion's Herald; but when its power was broken by the General Conference of New York, the slaveholding bishop repelled, and our very unity sacrificed for the slave, we deemed the battle won in the Church, though at a lamentable sacrifice, and not in the wisest way, and thenceforward considered the duty of Methodists toward it as being in the general public field, where they could act as citizens, and the true policy of the Church to be the maintainance of its disciplinary testimony, and the extension of its influence Southward as fast as it could, among all good men there who sympathized with its evangelical anti-slavery position, not excepting anti-slavery slaveholders, who were involved in the embarrassments of the evil, but were at heart opposed to it."

The resolution of the Cincinnati Conference to change the Rule, so as to make it prohibit "buying, selling, or holding" slaves, which is now passing round the Conferences, and which is to be the test question at the General Conference, was rejected by both the Baltimore Conferences. Dr. Stevens, we opine, trusts to its failure to get in the Annual Conferences a constitutional majority of three fourths. We shall see.

In the Baltimore East Conference, the Oregon Conference resolutions in favor of lay-representation were rejected by a vote of only 78 to 64—a vote deemed astonishingly favorable to the lay-movement, when it is considered that the region where it occurred has always been the principal battle-ground between Episcopal and Protestant Methodists.

GEORGIA CONFERENCE DEPOSITORY AND PAPER.

THE Georgia Conference at its last session, rejected, by a considerable majority, the Abbey Plan for Conference Depositories. A committee was appointed, however, to decide finally upon the matter, and they have recently resolved to have a Conference Depository, located at Macon.

We notice, also, that it is proposed to have a Methodist paper in Georgia. We find the following in the Southern Advocate:

NEW PAPER IN GEORGIA.—A correspondent writes to a Georgia exchange of the Charleston Courier, "We understand there is shortly to be started in Atlanta, a new paper, advocating the principles of the M. E. Church, South. It is to be conducted by two practical printers, who are worthy and well qualified to undergo the labors of a newspaper life. The Methodist denomination in Georgia need a paper. We hope this enterprise, if gone into, will be successful."——We are of opinion that the Methodist in Georgia have a paper.—ED.

We have heard before that it was the policy of some of our leading ecclesiastical statesmen to have a Depository and paper in each Conference. Southern Methodist Journalism will "spread itself" after awhile. Gold-leaf seems to be preferred to coin. The Southern Advocate lost North Carolina, bid for Alabama, and certainly should have Georgia.

OUR OWN COLLEGES.

The Southern Christian Advocate copies our remarks on the proposed celebration at Randolph, Macon, College, and, in addition to our list of the alumni known to us, says:

We can add several to this list, of whom Alma Mater may be proud, without going beyond the region of our circulation to find them—and yet her illustrious sons are found all over the South. We may mention as prominent in the service of the Church as ministers or members, in South Carolina, Prof. Warren DuPre, Rev. C. S. Beard, F. A. Conner, Esq., Rev. J. W. Wightman, Rev. W. G. Connor and the Rev. W. H. Lawton. In Georgia, we have Rev A. T. Mann, D. D., Rev. J. R. Thomas, D. D., Rev. Thomas B. Russell and Professor Marcellus Stanley and Rev. F. X. Forster. In Alabama, are Rev. E. Wadsworth, D. D., Rev. Thos. J. Koger, Rev. Thomas J. Moore and W. F. Samford Esq.

And it is not unlikely that there are others, whom we do not personally know, in all these States. We only mention those whom we do know and can now call to mind. By the way, do the Virginia Alumni intend to take any steps in respect to the proposed gathering? Our mother's sons would be glad to hear from them if they make any move.

THE GENERAL MINUTES.

Since the General minutes were stereotyped, the Book Editor has received the statistics of the Pacific Conference, forwarded by the Secretary. The authentic figures, which appear in the printed Minutes, do not materially change the total numbers, as previously reported. There are in the Pacific Conference 49 traveling and 38 local preachers, 1457 white members, 1210 white probationers, 14 colored members—total 2768, showing an increase last year of 1039. The numbers in all the Conferences are 2408 traveling, 163 superannuated, 4984 local preachers, 419,592 white members, 80,102 white probationers, 155,935 colored members, 3297 Indian members, 577 Indian probationers; total ministers and members, 699,164, showing a net increase of of 43,387 last year. Had several changes been reported which are left blank, the total would be about 700,000, increase about 44,000.

DEATH OF MRS. MOELLING.

We regret to announce the sudden death of this amiable Christian lady, the wife of Rev. P. Moelling, editor of the Apologist, on Tuesday last, in this city. She was an estimable woman, eminently "a crown to her husband," an ornament to the Church, and highly esteemed by a large circle of acquaintances. There was somewhat in her unostentatious devoutness of spirit which always recommended religion to those who came within the sphere of her influence. Surely for such there is a better world than the one she has left. Our esteemed brother has our sincerest sympathies in his affliction. May the merciful kindness of the Lord be his comfort, according to the word wherein He hath caused him to hope.

We are grieved to find the above in the Texas Advocate. May God comfort our afflicted brother!

CONSOLATORY.—The astronomers give out for the benefit of all those disappointed persons who did not get a good sight at the comet last summer, that it will appear again before the public, for a few nights only, in the fall of 2147.

A LIFE IN HARMONY WITH GOODNESS AND BEAUTY.

Have you not frequently been filled with a sort of mortified grief, in reading upon the tombstone of an irreligious friend a beautiful scriptural inscription, setting forth the doctrine of the future life and the happiness of the good who die in the hope of that life?

One good rule of life is, to so live that these beautiful flowers of scriptural sentiment and hope will not wither in the soil and atmosphere of your tomb. How unutterably mournful, to see a sweet and pious wife shedding her tears and venting her grief over the dead form of a wicked, selfish, cold-hearted husband! On the other hand, how unspeakable the charm of even this sad moment, when every one feels that "lovely and beautiful in their lives, in death they were not divided."

An adulterous seducer and poisoner, serpent-like, of the Eden of household peace, is slain by the avenger, and, in the midst of official eulogies and the fragrance of spring-flowers, is buried in the arms of the beauteous wife of his youth, who died many years before; and his grave bedewed with the tears of a sweet daughter just budding into womanhood. What a shocking violation of every harmony of the universe! How beautiful, had his life been as pure as the memory of his sainted wife, and the love of his bereaved daughter!

SEED, FLOWER, AND FRUIT.

Good sympathies are good seeds; but they must develop into the leaf of good motives, the bloom of good principles, and the fruit of good practice. Our sympathies are with the right. Could our principles be made harmonious with our sympathies, and our practice to conform to our principles, we should be an excellent and happy people. At the grave of a child—on witnessing the grief of a bereaved wife or mother—at the sight of misfortune or misery—all hearts are melted and all eyes overflow—even those of men of hardened, wicked, and even criminal lives. What grand and beautiful, but fruitless, possibilities gleam out on the tear-streaming cheeks of a man with softened heart and yet dissolute life! How many receive this "grace of God in vain!" This sympathy with the right, this "grace of God that bringeth salvation" with it, "hath appeared unto all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we shall live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." "For the earth, which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God; but that which beareth thorns and briers is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned."

"COME OUT OF THE ASHES."

The Memphis Christian Advocate, which was consigned to the ashes by a ruthless fire not long since, has come out of them again, as it has heretofore come out of every other superincumbent discouragement or difficulty. Our brother Watson is off to New York for new type, etc.

Coming out of the ashes has some noble precedents: To cite one: Our venerable father in Israel, Rev. Ebenezer Hearn, of the Alabama Conference, visiting the city recently, gave us at a dinner table the following incident:

Bishop Asbury, somewhere in Tennessee, was preaching a funeral discourse in memory of Bishop Coke, from the text, "He was a good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith," etc. He ended his account of Dr. Coke with the following remarkable sentence—"So much for a man, who looked like a boy, spake like a woman, and came up out of the ashes!"

AN UNWISE SON OF A WISE FATHER.

FRANCIS S. KEY—the father of Philip Barton Key, who was lately killed by Mr. Sickles, in consequence of his having dishonored Mrs Sickles—was a pious man and a poet. He composed hymns, as well as "The Star Spangled Banner." One of them, it is said, commences thus:

If life's pleasures charm thee,
Give them not thy heart.

"My son," said Solomon, "if sinners entice thee, consent thou not." David said: "Solomon, my son, know thou the God of thy fathers, and serve Him with a perfect heart and willing mind. If thou seek Him, He will be found of thee; but if thou forsake Him, He will cast thee off forever." So it has been with the suddenly destroyed and dishonored Key; so it has been with thousands of others. "Wherewith shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto, according to Thy word."

A TRUE CIRCUIT PREACHER.

REV. F. A. WEST, of the British Conference, has declined visiting the United States, in consequence of the demand for his labors on his circuit. A circuit preacher that, of the right sort, President of the Conference, officially appointed to visit the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States—a great honor in the vote, and greatly to be honored during the visit—and yet cannot leave his circuit appointments! Good circuit preachers are a desideratum of modern Methodism. Men who cannot willingly suffer an appointment to be lost, however insignificant, for any cause, either before or after Conference. Circuit preachers, whose administration will make circuit appointments as fixed, permanent, and reliable, as those of city stations. Such men are worth a ten-acre-field-full of that sort of preachers who leave their circuits a month before Conference, and are a month after Conference getting to their work. A good circuit preacher is next to a Bishop in worth and honor.

ANCIENT COINS.

Three interesting copper coins have been politely submitted to our inspection, all of them old, and one of them of a high antiquity. The first and oldest is a coin of Marcus Agrippa, a distinguished Roman General under Augustus Cæsar, and by marriage, his nephew. On the obverse is the inscription "Cos III," indicating the date of the coin, 27 years before Christ, when Agrippa was made third time Consul, and married Marcella, the Emperor's niece. On the reverse are the letters "S. C.," implying "by consent of the Senate." The coin next in point of age is one of Heraclius I, and of his son, Emperor of the Eastern Empire. It is inscribed with "Con," meaning Constantinople, of which Heraclius became master in 610, after Christ, and "Anno IIII," meaning, no doubt, in the fourth year of his power, or 614 after Christ, the same year in which Jerusalem was taken by the Persians, and two years after Mohammed published the Koran. The third and latest in date of these relics of a far gone past is a coin of Romanus, the Second of the Eastern Empire, in some year after Christ between 959, when Romanus ascended the throne, and 963, when he was succeeded by Nicephorus III. [Nat. Intell.]

THE MARRIED!—The affection that links together man and wife is a far holier and more enduring passion than the enthusiasm of young love. It may want its gorgeousness—it may want its imaginative character, but it is far richer, and holier and more trusting in its attributes. Talk not to us of the absence of love in wedlock. No! it burns with a steady and brilliant flame, shedding a benign influence upon existence, a million times more precious and delightful than the cold dreams of philosophy.

THE Washington correspondent of The Presbyterian (O. S.) says that a wealthy planter at the South has subscribed twenty-five thousand dollars toward the Metropolitan Free Church, to be erected in Washington, D. C. The donor has given the amount to be invested for the perpetual endowment of the pastor.

COUNT CAVOUR.

The Paris correspondent of the Nottonal Intelligencer gives the following biographical sketch of Count Cavour, the Sardinian Prime Minister, and one of the most enlightened statesmen of the present day: He was born in 1809; the son of a merchant of Nice. His family nobility is the creation of the late King, Charles Albert, and his Italian designation is Camillo, Conte of Cavour. In 1847 he established a constitutional newspaper, Il Risorgimento, through which he communicated to the world some notable papers on questions of political economy. He grew alike in public and royal favor, but in the following year, during the contest with Austria, his influence yielded sensibly to that of partisans of a less rational faction. The fatal day of Novara, the abdication of Charles Albert and the ruin of the Democratic party followed together. They were the immediate harvest of Radetzky's victory. Count Cavour was summoned forthwith to the councils of the present king, (1849,) first, as Minister of Commerce and Agriculture, and subsequently, in 1851, as Minister of Finance. He strove in this latter capacity to repair the losses of a most disastrous war; but in practical financial administration his success was never remarkable. Finding himself declining in favor and popularity, he suddenly broke from his colleagues, Foresta and d'Azeglio, and assumed the leadership of a new liberal, or national party. He overthrew the Ministry, and, on the 30th of October, 1852, organized a new one. He has ever since retained the post of first Minister of the Crown, achieving entire ascendency over the mind of the King, and sustained at all points by faithful and solid majorities in the Legislature. He has been uniformly the friend of liberal doctrines, of freedom of the press, freedom of religious opinion, of industry, of trade, and of all popular rights guaranteed by the new constitution, (that of 1848.) He has waged incessant war against Church influence in matters of State. The sale of mortmain property was proposed and executed by him, and he succeeded to such an extent in confiscating clerical monopolies as to draw upon the king and himself the thunders of the Vatican. He was compelled to desist for the time from other direct measures for the total emancipation of the laity, but, with a still broader sweep towards it, he has assumed the leadership in the cause of Italian independence, or to use the correct phrase, Italian unification. He boldly displayed again the national flag, the tri-color, bearing, as in eighteen hundred and forty-eight, the rallying cross of Savoy. It was Count Cavour who, in hopes to enlist France and England in the cause, sent 30,000 Sardinian troops to the siege of Sebastopol; and in the Congress of Paris his efforts were fearless and unceasing to drag to light the deplorable state of Roman no less than Austrian Italy. The Coegress was declared to be without this extended jurisdiction; but the brave Sardinian had at least brought his purpose home to the very council chamber of the sovereigns, and from every quarter of Italy he received the most marked tokens of sympathy and gratitude. A striking evidence of these feelings was the open subscription and direct contribution throughout the Italian peninsula to the armieg of the citadel of Alexandria, a Sardinian half-dismantled fortress of great importance, upon the Tanaro.

Austria, incensed at such a demonstration, hastily recalled her envoy from Turin. Diplomatic relations have not been resumed; and Count Cavour, relying upon the sympathies of the world, upon national sentiment, and a popularity wonderfully confirmed by the elections, has girded himself fearlessly but prudently for a coming crisis. He is in the meridian of his days; young, at fifty; a man of middle hight, resembling in some degree Mr. Thiers, but taller and handsomer. A keen and sarcastic expression, like that of the French statesman, has been observed in the aspect of the Italian; but his general manner, stamped with the easy self-reliance of a strong mind, is described as that of a man to whom political station is but the opportunity of serving his country. In the Assembly, on ordinary occasions, he is likened to an intendant of some great family, giving a plain, straightforward account of his stewardship. He is always ready nevertheless to provoke discussion in order to explain everything the more lucidly; and when the subject is of a more serious nature, involving changes of policy and action, he occupies the tribune, "transfigured," to use the words of a French tourist, "into the impersonation of a statesman. His language becomes elegant; his voice sonorous; his ideas come forth in profound, logical order; his oratorical action all suited to the moment, to the emotion; and the statesman, unrivalled, commands inevitably the admiration of the Assembly."

Such is the substance of several well-accredited accounts of King Cavour, as he is familiarly called, whose royal patron has won general approbation in deferring implicitly to the master-mind of his Minister. King Victor Emmanuel, a brave soldier, who, everywhere conspicuous in the field of Novara, received about his person, on that disastrous day, no less than seventeen balls, (if we may credit certain French pamphleteers,) but whose early gallantry and more authentic wound at Golto had already made him a youthful hero, is undoubtedly looking forward for the active service to which his Minister is striving to conduct him.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE METHODIST, or Incidents and Characters from Life in the Baltimore Conference. By Miriam Fletcher. With an Introduction, by W. P. Strickland, D. D. In two volumes. Derby and Jackson, New York.

The best evidence we have of the truthfulness and interest of these handsome volumes, is their hearty recommendation in the Baltimore Christian Advocate. The next best is the favorable notices of the press generally, Methodist and otherwise. In addition to the pleasant style and absorbing interest of the narrative, we are assured that it rescues from oblivion, very much that is important to Methodist history in that renowned old seat of Methodism, the Baltimore Conference.

THE HIGHER CHRISTIAN LIFE. By Rev. W. E. Boardman. "That ye may be filled with all the fulness of God." Henry Hoyt, Boston.

This work treats of "the higher Christian life," in holiness, as follows: Part I., What it is; Part II., How attained; Part III., Progress and Power. Entire sanctification, viewed from a Presbyterian stand-point, and and urged with great earnestness, is enough to say of this book, to secure a deep interest in it. It is a work by a Presbyterian Caughey. No Christian can read it without having his soul benefitted.

VERNON GROVE, or Hearts as they are. A Novel. Rudd and Carleton, New York.

GRACE O'GARA is the title of a charming little juvenile volume from Carlton and Porter, New York.

CAUTION.

A young man about twenty years of age, medium size, light hair and complexion, good looking, calling himself John E. Miller, and representing himself as the son of a deceased Methodist preacher of the Virginia Conference, came to this city some two months since, without means seeking employment; was befriended according to his necessities, and recently left, leaving his friends to foot his bills to the tune of about $80. Having learned that he has been getting money on the strength of the names of Methodist ministers of this city, we are compelled, in duty to our friends and the public, however reluctantly, to make this statement.

MISSIONARIES FOR JAPAN.—The Foreign Board of the Reformed Dutch Church of New York are at present engaged in making the necessary arrangements for a practical Christian civilization mission to Japan. The mission will consist of six persons invested with peculiar abilities for the prosecution of the work, which is to be of a practical, illustrative and educational character. Two of the number are clergymen—the Rev. S. R. Brown and the Rev. G. F. Berbeck; three of the number are ladies, and Dr. D. B. Simmons, the sixth, is a physician and surgeon. The party is to sale about the 1st of May next.

BENSON A PLAGIARIST.

MR. EDITOR: In the Advocate of the 6th of October 1858, a communication, under the above caption, charges Mr. Benson with "the most remarkable instance of Plagiarism to be found—so far as I (he) knows, in the whole circle either of secular or religious Literature." "It is this: Bensons' commentaries to the 58th of Isaiah is taken almost entirely from Pool's Annotations." This charge is made after an "examination sufficiently thorough" to justify the writer in asserting that Benson "makes no acknowledgement to Pool, either in his preface or in the body of the work." Again—"I do not charge that Benson has copied Pool, on the whole of the Old Testament. But I charge, that into whatever Book or chapter I have looked, I have found the stolen goods of Pool." "For the benefit of" the public, there follows a list of books and chapters, which the writer asserts he has compared; "carefully examining every verse," and has only "found the stolen goods of Pool." I have been expecting some one of the gold and steel pen phalanx, to turn their keen points of pen and criticism against the communication under consideration, but have been disappointed at reading two attempts at an apology for Mr. Benson, instead of a vindication; leaving the charge of plagiarism hanging as a pall over the reputation of one of England's best Biblical scholars. Whose life and labors were directed by a highly cultivated Evangelical spirit—and who having served his generation, as an able minister of the "truth as it is in Jesus," has left to the Methodist Church the legacy of his labors, and naturalized character.

The writer of the "charge," I imagined (at the first reading of his articles,) to be some "fledgling" of a late school of writers whose forte lies in bold assertions, without much regard to facts as proof of what they say. But here are the proofs, thirty chapters, selected out of fourteen books, and over the signature of J. J. Wheat; and these "chapters and verses carefully examined" and etc. All this looks like candor, and should demand confidence; but still facts are so "stuborn," that they oppose the admission of the statement. First, as to the statements, "into whatever book he had looked, he had found the stolen goods of Pool;" yet "Genesis" has no traces of plagiarism." And why? Is it not one of the "Books looked into?" Or, was it because he had made but "a very slight examination?" Other books seem to have been very slightly examined as well—or was it because of the fact that in the first chapter of Gen., 11 and 12 verses, his eye fell on these words—"This clause is so often added," says Pool, to show that all the disorders, evil, and hurtful qualities that are in the creatures, and not to be imputed to God, who made all of them good, but to man's sin; which hath corrupted their nature and perverted their use." Second, To the facts. In the list of books and chapters, in which he had "carefully examined every verse"—I find second Kings, 10th and Ecl., 1st. Will you turn to second Kings, 10th chapter, 20 and 21 verses; look at the bottom of the exposition of those verses, and read—"see Pool and Dodd." Then turn to Ecl., first chapter and 15th verse. "He was not only a King," says Pool, "but also a Teacher of God's people; who, having sinned grievously in the eyes of all the world, thought himself obliged to publish his repentance, and to give public warning to all, to avoid those rocks upon which he had split."

3d. The balance of testimony—having disposed of two of those "closely examined" chapters—what of the remaining twenty-eight. One of them is not, if the types copied the manuscript—"Lev. "28"—there being only twenty-seven chapters in the book. It however, the instances given, after a "very slight examination," do not refute the charge, so broadly and unqualifiedly made, that Benson "makes no acknowledgement to Pool, either in his preface or in the body of his works," if you will take the trouble, or if brother J. J. W. will turn to and closely examine every verse in the following chapters, he may be relieved of the horror of looking upon stolen goods, and see the proprietor himself. Ex. 31—" Some commentators have quoted Pool." Num. 24—"Pool, quoted by Bishop Newton." Deut. 21—Judges, 11—first Kings, 2, 4, 6—second Kings, 16. Bishop Patric, Pool and others—16—first Chron. 27—second Chron. 35—Nehe. 8—13—Pool and Dodd—Est. 2—3—Pool and Dodd—Job—2—3—Pool and Dodd—6—13—17—21—Pool and Hsary—26—28—37—Pool Hcary and others—38—40—41—and 42—Psa.—38—44—and 50—Prov. 8—Isaiah—7—Usher, Pool, Hcary, and others—19—23—stated by Pool, and adopted by bishop Lowth—33—Pool and some others. Here are forty times Pool is acknowledged by Mr. Beason—and from the frequency with which his name is used with others it is justice to conclude, that other writers having adopted Mr. Pool's expositions, Mr. Beason copying from them—Pool may be found in Benson, while Benson having copied others, gives them credit.

In conclusion, I hope the brother will not deem it impertinent, if one in obscure position, and of unpretending attainments, should presume to advise him, to be not so hasty in the future, to bring an accusation, where neither truth nor justice will sustain him; also to suggest to him, whether it would not comport with Christian manliness, and that "charity which thinketh no evil," "but rejoiceth in the truth," to withdraw from before the public, in some suitable way, a charge, productive of no good, but at variance with every rule of Christian equity. Let this wonderful "discovery" leave him in the unenviable condition of the man who some years ago filed and cut up some gold and spread it on the surface of a rocky hill, to induce the belief that he had discovered a gold mine—but when the surface of the soil was removed the deception was discovered, and he left with the mortification of detection, and his untold land. THE DEPOSITORY.

A meeting of the citizens of Galveston was held at the Methodist Church, on Monday night last to consider the interests of the Methodist Book Depository in this place. Rev. James McLeod, of Richmond, Texas, stated the object of the meeting to be money—to pay for the Depository building. He advocated this object in an excellent and telling speech. J. Sorley, Esq., of Galveston, followed, in such an address as none but a business man can make—practical, concise and convincing. All his hearers were satisfied, doubtless, that the dollars given by the city for this enterprise, would be returned with heavy interest—in fact, that the thing considered in a commercial light, would pay. He also sketched rapidly but clearly the moral bearing of the institution. Mr. Sorley is a prominent member of the Presbyterian Church; our people are, therefore, the more indebted to him for this platform service. For although he took the true ground that denominationalism, in such enterprises as this, was nothing more than a public servant, yet there is a liberality in his assistance, which the liberal will duly appreciate.

Brief and useful remarks were made by Revs. F. C. Wilkes and J. W. Shipman.

The amount of money raised at the meeting and since is very encouraging; and we feel warranted in assuring our country readers that, when the full record of the effort is presented to them, they will do Galveston the justice to say that she has shown an enlightened generosity in this matter. We hope to present such a showing next week, as will lift a burden of anxiety off the friends of the Depository, and place our beautiful city still higher, if possible in their estimation. NEWSPAPER PERSONALITIES.—A late number of Blackwood's Magazine discusses the expediency and propriety of editorial writers for newspapers appealing their signatures to articles, and decides against it. Among the remarks, are the following on the American press: At the head of every journal the editor's name is printed in conspicuous letters; and the result is what? Are writers afraid to comment severely? Does the publicity of the newspaper organization make the journalists timid, circumspect, considerate of the feelings? It does just the reverse. The personalities in which almost every newspaper throughout the Union indulges is something astounding. One New York paper, during the late panic, published the name of every gentleman who bought a silk dress for his wife or gave a dinner party to his friends! We all know how common it is for the American journals to criticise by name the personal appearance of ladies at balls and at watering places. It is quite possible that American ladies may be found to relish such notoriety; but such notoriety is here regarded as not less un-English than, on the other hand, is the secrecy of the ballot.

SECESSION OF CALIFORNIA.

The Bulletin, one of the most fluential and well edited papers in the State, says: "This condition of vassalage has been patiently borne, until "forbearance ceases to be a virtue." Continual neglect and injustice must destroy the affection and allegiance which this State has ever felt, and keenly felt for the confederacy. A new generation, rapidly growing up in this distant country, who were not bound by no habit of love for the old States, but who will examine the question of their political relations, with respect to their advantages, on their own merits solely. If Congress persists in the endavor to estrange the Pacific States, that end will be more suddenly consummated than perhaps people abroad imagine. Our connection with the Union is all to the profit of the other side of the Continent now. Nothing but the closest intimacy, and most expeditious intercommunication, can maintain affection opposed constantly by interest. And if the East will not consent to establish that intimacy and freedom of intercourse, she must expect to see these great States of the West fall away from them. Without a railroad California is not a sister and an equal in the Union. She will not long consent to hold any other position in a confederacy."

COTTON KING INDEED.

THE cotton crop of the United States this year, says Harpers Weekly, will probably exceed 3,800,000 bales. This crop will average to the planter a shilling or 12½ cents a pound. The better qualities are at this moment in demand in New Orleans at 18 and 19 cents. Since the country first grew cotton there never was a year when the yield was so large or the profit so enormous. When we borne in mind that, on the average, 6½ cents a pound remunerates the planter for cotton laid down at the nearest sea-port, some idea may be formed of the wealth which the South will acquire this year.

It will be safe to expect an astounding development of industry and agriculture throughout the South. When the enormous crops of 1855 and 1856 did for the Western cotton crops of 1857 and 1858 will do for the Southern railroads and steamboats will soon begin to take the place of Western schemes of a similar nature in the markets. Whatever is Southern will be in favor. The effect of the great increase of Southern wealth on the slavery controversy will be worth watching.

A VETERAN.—At the late Baltimore Conference, when the question, "Who are the superannuated preachers?" was taken up, an unusually affecting letter from Rev. Henry Smith was read to the Conference. This veteran soldier of the cross entered the Conference in 1794. And still is heard encouraging his more youthful comrades in the great battle between truth and error, Christ and Satan.

Like Caleb and Joshua, he and Bishop Soule are the only two survivors who were members of the General Conference of 1808, which framed our Church Constitution.

EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE.—From the Minutes, published acetly in pamphlet form, by that excellent workman foreman of the Advocate office, we learn that the total increase of membership for 1858, was 3,754, distributed as follows: Increase of white members, 423—of white probationers, 2,285—of colored members, 607—of colored probationers 439. Two of the circuits report 100 probationers each; one reports 357, and several others about 150 to 200 and upwards. Adding members and probationers together, the reports from the Districts are as follows: San Augustine, 2,675; Marshall, 2,395; Clarksville, 2,266; Dallas, 2,647; Palestine, 3,175; Woodville, 1,218.

MORMONS.—The Utah correspondent of the Chicago Tribune has taken notes of the social status of that territory. The result foots up as follows: Three hundred and eighty-seven men with seven or more wives; of these fifteen have more than nineteen wives; eleven hundred men with four and fourteen hundred with more than one each.

THE MEDICAL SCHOOLS OF PHILADELPHIA.—The following gives the number of students of the principal medical schools of the city, at the session of 1858-'59: Jefferson, 570; University of Pennsylvania, 409; Pennsylvania College, 150; Philadelphia College, 75; Homœpathic College, 80; College of Dental Surgery, 73; making a total of 1357.

WE LEARN FROM A New York paper that an attempt is about to be made in that city to establish a monthly religious daily paper. The capital named is $150,000, and it is proposed to make it a first class paper in all respects, and that it shall be thoroughly permeated by the religious element. Dr. McClintock is to be one of the editors.

NEITHER SCHOOLS NOR NEWSPAPERS.—Sir William Berkley, one of the early governors of Virginia, in 1671 wrote to King Charles II: "I thank God there are no free schools nor printing-presses here, and I trust there will not be this hundred years; for learning breeds up heresies and sects and all abominations. God save us from both!"

THE GRAIN CROPS.—A letter from Kentucky says the growing crops of small grain have come out wonderfully, and the prospect of an abundant yield of wheat is highly flattering. Similar reports are received from all parts of Tennessee.

THE HOUSEHOLD EXPENSES of the late Postmaster General Brown are said to have been $30,000 a year—and his munificent income fully enabled him to pay with embarrassment.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands".

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Union Circuit.—REV. AUGUS DOWLING, writes: "We are rejoicing in the hope of great times on Union Circuit during the year 1859. Already we have had some very excellent meetings; we have not been able to make but one regular appointment yet, on account of high water. We have had to swim our horses times to make that round. The prospect is good for a revival all round the circuit. We have received up to this time, by letter, nineteen into full connection, whites—five colored. On probation—two whites, nine blacks. Baptized seven adults—fourteen children.

We have built a parsonage in Lake Charles, and my family are in it enjoying the comforts of a parsonage. But your humble servant did several hard days work on it. The stewards have done but little for the support of the preacher yet, but we hope they will work in due time. I intend to present claims to all my congregations. I hope to do a good work for the Advocate this year."

Carroll Circuit.—REV. W. G. MCGAUGHEY, writes: "I am in a fine humor, and want to let you know it. The Carroll Circuit has redeemed its reputation and I want the world to know of it. They have just purchased a beautiful parsonage in the town of Floyd, the parish site for the parish of Carroll; for the sum of sixteen hundred dollars, eight hundred cash and eight hundred payable next February. The lot purchased consists of about three acres of ground, the improvements consist of a good dwelling with four comfortable rooms, and out-houses, etc. We have a brightning prospect in regard to religious matters generally. I am encouraged to push on boldly in the work."

FOREIGN.

ARRIVAL OF THE NEW YORK—ADVANCE IN COTTON.

A Peace Congress.

NEW YORK, April 5.—The American steamship New York arrived at this port this morning.

LIVERPOOL, March 22.—The sales of cotton the two business days since the sailing of the Persia were 22,000 bales.

Cotton has advanced 1-10 to ¼. The advance was caused by the advices from the United States, showing a falling off in the receipts of cotton at Southern ports, together with the more pacific aspect of affairs on the Continent.

The advance on Middling Orleans is 1-6d. Middling Orleans 5-16d.

LIVERPOOL, March 22.—Political News—Peace Congress.—The political news by the New York confirms our latest dispatches by the Persia of a more pacific turn of affairs on the Continent, the precise nature of which had not been transpired when the Persia sailed.

It now appears that Austria, through the intercession of Lord Cowley, has consented to the convening of a congress for the peaceful adjustment of the Italian question.

It is positively asserted that a peace congress will be held.

DOMESTIC.

WASHINGTON, April 4.—Extra Session of Congress.—The President to-day, in a conversation with a gentleman who called on him, remarked that there was no necessity for calling the extra session of Congress on account of the Post-office Department, but, said he, "Our foreign relations may necessitate an extra session. We shall have a most important Cabinet meeting to-morrow."

Daniel E. Sickles' Trial for Murder.—The trial of Daniel E. Sickles, member of Congress from New York, for the murder of Philip Barton Key, commenced to-day.

Consul to Nicaragua.—The President has appointed R. Runnells as Consul to San Juan del Sur. Mr. Runnells sails to-morrow for his post, in the California steamer via Panama. He takes out important dispatches for our Nicaraguan Minister, Gen. Lamar.

The Cass-Herran Treaty.—The Cass-Horran treaty has been under consideration by the Cabinet for some days, and our Government has decided to defer action upon the tonnage duties and other taxes provided for by the treaty of 1818 until the ratification of the new Granadian Government of several amendments which have been made in the Cass-Ferran treaty.

WASHINGTON, April 4.—The Washington Union of this morning says that the negotiations in regard to the construction of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty are proceeding to a satisfactory adjustment in accordance with our interpretation of its meaning.

The President has issued a proclamation that extensive sales of public lands will take place in Kansas and Nebraska, during the months of July, August and September.

The grand jury have made a presentment against Mr. Seaman, the late public printer; also against Mr. Cullom, the late clerk of the House of Representatives, and P. D. Duval, of Philadelphia, for illegal and fraudulent practices in connection with their respective offices. Cullom has given bail for his appearence to answer the charges brought against him.

George W. Jones, Esq., United States Senator from Iowa, has withdrawn his letter declining the mission to Bogota, and will shortly proceed thither to assume the duties of the position to which he has been appointed.

Charles A. Appleton, a brother to the Assistant Secretary of State, committed suicide in this city to-day.

Further from Nicaragua.

NEW YORK, April 2.—The Ouseley and Cass-Yrissari Treaties.—The United States slope-of-war Jamestown has arrived at this port from the coast of Nicaragua, and her commander, Captain Kennedy, corroborates the recent statements brought by the Northern Light in regard to Nicaraguan affairs.

The British treaty, negotiated by Sir W. G. Ouseley, in regard to the transit route, has been ratified by the Nicaraguan Government, with an additional article, to the effect that Nicaragua has surrendered none of her rights over the Mosquito territory. The treaty in relation to the surrender of the British protectorate over the Musquito territory was pending, but had not been ratified when the Jamestown sailed. The Cass-Yrissari treaty had not been acted upon. If it shall appear that Sir William Gore Ouseley has transcended or violated the instructions of his Government, our Government will formally request England to disavow his acts. It is confidently expected that if Nicaragua ratifies all the British treaties and rejects the Cass-Yrissari treaty, Gen. Lamar will be immediately withdrawn from Nicaragua, and Juarez, the Nicaraguan Minister at Washington, will be tendered his passports. It is reported that our vessels of war are to be concentrated at the most exposed points on the Nicaraguan coast for the protection of the persons and property of American citizens.

Heavy Fraud on the Government.—J. Churchill Woods, who was connected with the El Paso Wagon-road Company, was arrested yesterday and held to bail in the sum of $10,000, on the charge of having committed a heavy fraud on the Government in his disbursements on behalf of the wagon-road between El Paso and Fort Yuma.

WASHINGTON, April 2.—The Paraguay Expedition.—Dispatches from Commissioner Bowlin have been received at the State Department, which represent that there is a fair prospect of a satisfactory and peaceful settlement of the Paraguay difficulty. Negotiations were soon to be opened, and an amicable adjustment of the difficulties was confidently anticipated.

Arrival of the Coatzacoalcos.

The Louisiana Tehuantepec Company's new steamship Coatzacoalcos, Capt. Wilson, which left New York on the 23d ult., arrived at the South-west Pass yesterday afternoon. She is last from Havana, which port she left on the 26th ult.

This steamer is designed to take the place of that favorite vessel, the Quker City, between this city and the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, the Quaker City entering the line between New Orleans and New York. The Coatzacoalcos has been fitted up at a heavy expense, specially for the trade she is to run in, and her light draught will enable her navigate the river or harbor without fear of detention at its bar.

NEW ORLEANS SCHOOL OF MEDICINE.

THE ANNUAL commencement exercises of the New Orleans School of Medicine occurred at Lyceum Hall, when the degree of Doctor in Medicine was conferred upon a graduating class of thirty-six members, two of whom received the additional degree of Doctor of Pharmacy, and one, increasing the number of graduates to thirty-seven, received the degree of Doctor of Pharmacy only.

There was a very considerable assemblage of ladies and gentlemen at Lyceum Hall, and after music the exercises were opened by an appropriate prayer by Rev. Dr. Palmer. E. D. Fenner, M. D., Dean of the Faculty, in an address, happily conceived and eloquently delivered, in the course of which he referred to the exceeding eligibility of New Orleans as a place of medical instruction, and to the successful progress of the "School of Medicine," for which he predicted the brilliant future guaranteed by the past; presented the members of the graduating class to the Board of Trustees as matriculates worthy the degree of Doctor in Medicine, as they had passed a rigorous examination by the Faculty, calling upon them severally by name to rise in their seats.

Col. W. R. Miles, President of the Board of Trustees, then conferred the degree of Doctor in Medicine upon the following gentlemen composing the graduating class of the New Orleans School of Medicine:

Ludlof Fromm, Samuel J. Hull, Geo. T. Pursley, Fred Hazenburg, Richard H. Simmons, Narcisso Hiren, Clarence B. Turner, R. E. Ambrose and Auguste Richeloupe, of Louisiana.

John B. C. Lyles, Isham Kimball, A. Dorman Evans, John W. Hays, Robert G. Murphy and H. Sterne Brantley, of Alabama.

Martin A. Mortin, Thomas R. Hearn, Charles A. Kincaid, Jr., John C. Denson, Frank M. Ferrell, John W. Brown, Richard H. Hopkins and John B. W. Meek, of Mississippi.

Robt. T. Walker, John L. Alston, Daniel T. Taylor, Amasa H. Dubose and D. Sanford Humphries, of Texas.

Joseph B. Payne, Kenneth G. McCrae, Samuel F. Turner and Robt. A. Jamison, of Arkansas.

Georga W. Reddy, C. C. Burke, Thomas R. Ashford and Leonidas N. Renwick, of Georgea.

In the above list—A. Dorman Evans, of Alabama, and Fred. Hazenburg, of Louisiana, received the degrees both of Doctor in Medicine and Doctor in Pharmacy. M. Emilio Grunde, of Genoa, Italy—received the degree of Doctor Pharmacy only.

After the conferring of Degrees, Prof. Howard Smith, M. D., delivered the address of the Faculty to the graduating class. It was a finished and graceful effort, and if the graduates bear in mind and adhere to the precepts of private and professional government enunciated in the earnest and impressive manner and language of the speaker, the New Orleans School of Medicine may be proud to claim the title of being their alma mater. He impressed upon them that if, in the course of their experience, they made any discovery in the Art of Medicine, it was unworthy of them, as professors of a great science to be developed for the common benefit of mankind, to retain its knowledge for personal gain and advantage; that their profession was not a trade, and the grand purpose of their art was not money-making, but the cause of human progress and the amelioration of the ills of humanity. He urged the necessity of continuous and unremitting study, for though Professionals they should still be Students, and the cultivation of all the graces of the Christian gentlemen and the scholar, and closed with a feeling farewell to the class of whom it had been his duty and pleasure to be a preceptor.

The valedictory was delivered by A. Dorman Evans M. D., a member of the graduating class from Oreeno county, Alabama. It was a very happy effort; well written and feelingly and effectively delivered, and will doubtless be long remembered by the fellow-students of whom he was the spokesman, and in whose behalf he tendered the Faculty a grateful recognition for their untiring zeal and devotion to the interests of the class. The farewells to the Faculty and to the Graduating Class were discreetly temperate in expression, but so appropriate as to happily indicate that the ties of mutual esteem, by which they were as much connected as by their relations of pupilage and fellowship, were not sundered without pain and regret to all. LOCAL.

J. J. HOOPER, Esq., of the Montgomery Mail, whose arrival we noticed some days since, is on a tour of both business and pleasure; for among other responsibilities of a public or semi-public character with which he is always saddled, are those now devolving upon him as Secretary of the Provisional Board of Directors of the "Alleghany Copper Company," of which Dr. H. L. Anderson, of Alabama, is President, and which is organized under a charter from the State of Tennessee to work the rich mineral lands, including the famous "Polk-county mine," recently awarded the Corpomtion by a decision of the United States Supreme Court. These lands were examined by Lieut. Maury, of Washington, who, convinced of their exceeding richness, took $10,000 worth of stock, and $30,000 was lately subscribed in one day in Mobile. Mr. Hooper, whose headquarters are at the St. Charles Hotel, will give all information relative to this matter to those desiring to look into it. [Crescent.

THE COUNTERFEIT "TENS" on the Citizens' Bank were a great topic of talk and excitement yesterday. All over town, indoors, on the streets, and at the race-course, the business of comparing the true bills with the false was in progress, every body taking special mems. of the points of difference. Half a dozen times—for, be it known, the counterfeits, by their excellence, have been extensively put into circulation—we saw a genuine and counterfeit bill put in the hands of a man used to paper money, and saw that man perfectly incompetent to tell which was the good bill and which the bad. So excellent are the counterfeits, that a genuine Ten on the Citizens' Bank now scares almost everybody. We hear that the Bank intends reclaiming its Tens as soon as possible, and sending forth a new issue from new plates. [Crescent.]

DEATH OF LOGAN MCKNIGHT.—A sudden and painful death occurred on Saturday evening. Mr. Logan McKnight, a prominent and highly-esteomed citizen of the Fourth District, was out riding with his wife and sister-in-law, when he fell forward in the carriage and expired almost instantaneously, without breathing a word. His wife screamed; a gentlemen came running, and attempted to raise the deceased up, supposing he had but swooned; but was appelled to find that death had claimed his own. The body, after being carried into an adjacent grocery, where ineffectual restorntives were applied, (the scene of the occurrence being Royal and Bruilnes streets) was taken home, attended by the ladies, whose grief may be imagined but not described. A medical investigation determined disease of the heart as the cause of death.

Mr. McKnight was a native of Kentucky, 34 years of age; was a merchant of high integrity, and some time ago represented his District in the Common Council. A singular and sad coincidence was offered in the fact that on that same day Mr. McKnight had written and sent to two of the daily papers, for publication, an elegantly composed and feeling tribute to the memory of his late friend, John M. Bell, lost by the disaster to the Princess. This obituary of his friend and the sad story of his own untimely death, were published together yesterday.

NEW HOTEL.—The gentlemen who recently purchased the old American Theater site, on Poydras street, are anxious to satisfy the general desire and demand for a new hotel in that part of the city, and will proceed to do so, provided they are aided and encouraged by the citizens; those who are largely interested—the tradesmen, and the property-holders who own lots and reside near this locality.

The plan suggested is, that the citizens thus interested shall loan the proprietors a sufficient sum of money to build a suitable hotel, at a moderate rate of interest, say four per cent. This would be a safer and better plan than the formation of a Corporation composed of a large number of stockholders, who are pretty certain to be promised large dividends, and equally certain to realize none.

The whole business will be placed in the hands of safe, prudent and responsible men in whom greater reliance could be rested than in a Corporation, and who could give better security for the proper application of the funds and prompt peyment. It is true that the interest to be paid for such loan would be nominally small, compared with our usual rates—but in fact it would be made large by the addition which the erection of such an edifice would make to the value of the property and the business in the neighborhood.

The depreciation of this property over thirty per cent., in twelve or fifteen years, gives a pretty good standard of the benefit that would accrue to the neighboring lots, by improving this large, vacant place, in the very midst of this thoroughfare. Assuming that this decline will be arrested, and the value of property along that street restored to its former rates, by the improvement indicated, a loan, even at a small nominal rate, will be an excellent investment. It will increase the value of property at least twenty per cent. immediately on the completion of the hotel.

Thus the subscribers to the hotel enterprise who own property in the vicinity would realize 24 per cent. on their investment. There is no city in the world where local improvements affect so largely the value of surrounding property, and yet there are no property-holders who are so slow to comprehend and act upon the policy of making investments at small nominal rates, in view of large prospective benefits, and increased value of property. GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

APPROPRIATIONS OF THE LAST CONGRESS.—The appropriations passed by the last Congress were as follows: Military Academy, $179,588; Indian, $1,797,368; Consular and Diplomatic, $1,047,745; Army, $15,582,845; Naval, $10,654,043; Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, $6,743,743; Fortifications, $1,000,000; Miscellaneous, $2,345,000; Coast Survey, $452,000; Re-issue of Treasury Notes, $20,000,000. Total, $59,801,332. To this should be added the Postoffice Appropriation of $20,000,000 which failed to pass; which makes the total exponses of the Government $80,297,f20.

THE COMING ELECTIONS.—Early this month elections will occur in Connecticut and Rhode Island; in Virginia, on the 4th Thursday of May; on the 1st Monday of August in Alabama, Kentucky and Texas; on the 1st Thursday of August in Tennessee; on the 2d Thursday of August in North Carolina; on the 1st Monday of October in Georgia and Mississippi; on the 2d Tuesday of October in Minnesota; on the 1st Monday (7th) of November in Louisiana, and on the 1st Wednesday of November (2d) in Maryland.

COTTON MANUFACTURES IN GREAT BRITAIN.—One leading feature in the foreign trade of Great Britain is, that the consumption of cotton in that country by manufacturers is about 2,100,000 bales, which, at fifty dollars per bale, is equal to 105 millions of dollars. Now, the value of cotton goods exported alone is stated at forty-three millions sterling,

Or.....$215,000,000

And we may estimate the domestic consumption of Great Britain to be as much.....215,000,000

Making an aggregate of.....431,000,000
Original cost.....105,000,000

Surplus profits on cotton annually.....$325,000,000

The importance of the cotton manufacture to Great Britain may be inferred from the fact that in 1850 there were 379,600 persons employed in the cotton factories alone, besides 303,000 in the manufacture of woolens, worstends, flax, and silks.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, April 5, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New-Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 2d inst.: The operations of the past week have been to but a moderate extent in our market generally, and it will be seen that the movament in our leading staple, Cotton, has received some check from the tenor of late European advices. In the Sugar market a better feeling prevailed in the early part of the week, and improved prices were obtained; while Molasses has continued heavy and drooping. In Tobacco there is not much movement, and dullness pervades nearly all departments of the Western Produce market. The advices received on Wednesday, per steamers Kangaroo and Persia, the latter bringing dates to 10th ult. from Liverpool, reports a decline in Cotton of 1-16 to ⅛d. The Manchester advices were also less favorable, there being less activity for goods and yarns. At Havre the market was quiet but without change. The river is ten inches below high-water mark, and two inches higher than at same period last year. In the early part of the week, though operations were somewhat obstructed by the full prices claimed and delay in receipt of the America's advices, which did not come to hand until a late hour on Monday, a fair amount of business was transacted. The sales of the first three days summed up 27,500 bales, with ⅛c. advance on Middling qualities. On Wednesday the market opened with advanced claims, but buyers did not come forward freely, and a check was given to operations early in the day by receipt of later European advices reporting a decline in the Liverpool market. Under these circumstances business was confined to about 5000 bales. On Thursday there was a limited attendance of buyers and the market presented a more quiet appearance than for some time past, the sales being confined to about 4,500 bales, while yesterday business was almost wholly suspended, the sales barely reaching 500 bales. Thus making a total for the past three days of 10,000 bales; and for the whole week of 37,500 bales; the receipts, during same period, 24,148; and the exports, 63,747 bales. Stock, in Presses and on ship-board, not cleared on the 1st inst. 417,244 bales. With respect to prices, we have to state that at the opening of the market on Wednesday, factors generally demanded rates somewhat above our quotations, but the European advices at once checked the upward tendency, and the comparatively limited business of the past day or two has rendered figures in a great measure nominal. Factors now appear disposed to meet buyers about upon the basis of our quotations, while the latter manifest a desire to be further advised respecting the state of European affairs.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

PUBLISHING-HOUSE NOTICES.

"NEW EDITIONS of a great many of our books have just been printed, and others are in the press. Life of Capers is likely to have a good run; Theophilus Walton already has it—the eleventh thousand is out. Watson's Dictionary enlarged, with New Biblical Atlas and Gazetteer, the second edition beautifully brought out; Australia, Art of Printing, Chapters for Children, Dawn of Civilization, Alfred the Great, Learning to Feel, Fifty Beautiful Ballads, and others of this class, are in the list—a good sign for the young folks; we are glad to see a demand for this kind of reading. The Dairyman's Daughter, with an Introduction containing nearly half as much matter as Mr. Richmond's narrative. The wonder has been expressed that any one could write the history of the Isle of Wight without noticing the Dairyman's Daughter: some may perhaps wander that Mr. Richmond could write her life without hinting that she was a Wesleyan Methodist. We presume he suppressed this fact, to secure for his book admission into circles where Methodism was at a great discount. Our addition to the narrative gives it great interest, while the cost is not increased. Our Sunday-school Hymns, Questions on Genesis, and Southern Methodist Primer, are reprinted in large editions; let them be everywhere introduced. The editor's little book on Holiness is also in the list of reprints: the times seem to demand a plain, scriptural, Wesleyan essay on this subject, and ours has been considered not unmeet for the place it occupies. There is also a new edition of our book on Baptism. We may take occasion to say, that after reading a great many new works on that subject, we have found nothing that we consider necessary to add to our treatise. We presume there are very few available arguments, if any, that have not been pressed into service. Several books, etc., have been written in reply to the treatise: we have not read them, but our friends who have, assure us that our positions are fruitlessly assailed: we advanced more but such as we thought would stand the test. As the book covers all the points belonging to the subject of Baptism, some of our Bishops, and other leading men, have recommended it as a suitable text-book for those who may not be able to find another so convenient for the purpose. We are pleased to see a demand for a new edition of Bishop Pierce's Incidents of Western Travel, to which another chapter (on Texas) has been added, increasing the value of this interesting work. A large edition of Songs of Zion, a Supplement to our Church Hymn Book, and the best collection of hymns and spiritual songs apart from that work, and another of the Discipline, have also been issued—a favorable symptom. Those excellent little books, Home, by Hay, and Family Government, by Bishop Andrew, and others which we cannot now specify, are in the list. Our Fifty Dollar Young People's Library will be kept full, ready for the largest demands. Our friends would do well to send for the Almanac, containing the Catalogue, and make out orders to supply the schools in this springtide of the year.

"IN PRESS.—We are printing a valuable work by Dr. Sunnett, entitled, "Discussions in Literature and Religion;" it contains the best of his essays, furnished from time to time to various periodicals, addresses, etc., carefully corrected and revised. It will be a portly duodecimo. The numerous friends of Dr. S. will be glad to see these valuable papers reproduced in this form. We need not say the author is one of the most vigorous thinkers of the age. Dr. M'Tyeire's prize essay on the "Duties of Masters," has been revised and enlarged—we should rather say re-written—and will deservedly take its place with the standard literature of our Church; we bespeak for it a universal circulation—a work of this sort is greatly needed. The Life of Adam Clarke, by Dr. Etheridge, which was noticed in this Journal at the time of its first appearance in England, advance sheets having been kindly sent us by the Wesleyan editor in London, will be a rich addition to our biographical literature. It has had already an immense run in England. The Old Life of Clarke is an interesting but chaotic work—compared with which this a perfect cosmos: we have writers among us, perhaps, who could have produced its equal, had they been in possession of the materials which the family of Dr. C. and the British Conference laid at the disposal of the learned biographer.

"THE MINUTES OF THE ANNUAL CONFERENCES OF THE M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, for 1858, show an increase of 43,398 ministers and members, during the year. The increase would be about 44,000 if several charges in the Kentucky Conference had been reported. This would make the total number of ministers and members about 700,000: the figures reported are 699,175. The delay in the issue of this Annual was occasioned by the non-reception of statistics from certain quarters. We make up the statistics of the Pacific Conference from a Church paper, the official copy not having yet reached us."

NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY.

All the Books Published by the Church, South—that is, the Books in the FIRST PART of the Catalogue issued at Nashville—we have, and sell at NASHVILLE PRICES. Of the SECOND PART, we have only the following Books, which we sell at the prices annexed, less 20 per cent. on time, and 25 per cent. for cash.

Of those Books we have not time now to speak particularly. Suffice it at present to mention "Bledsoe's Theodicy" at $1 50, and in Turkey at $2—the greatest thunderbolt forged against Calvinism in three centuries. It has proved itself exceedingly troublesome to all of that faith; in fact, as "horrible" to them as the Decree was to Calvin.

OUR OWN BOOKS.

Whenever we see a good thing we like to circulate it, to-wit:—

"Mind your Own Business, is an old injunction which cannot be too scrupulously observed. Especially would we urge it upon our Church in regard to our publishing interests. The time was when we had to depend upon others for our religious literature, not having a book or paper in the land that we could call our own. But our circumstances have changed; we now have an ample supply of weeklies, monthlies, and quarterlies, the largest list of general religious reading books and Sunday-school books printed in this (Southern) country, many of which have reached to an almost unparalleled circulation. Besides we have multiplied greatly in our numbers and wealth. Only let us purchase, read and circulate the issues of our own press first, and as largely as they deserve, and we shall natend our achievements beyond the highest expectations of the most believing ones among us. Scarcely a day passes which does not reveal some new success of our press. Let us be of good cheer then, and push on in our "great work;" rejoicing always and heartily in the great good being done by others, but attending faithfully to the peculiar work which God in his wise providence has assigned to us."

Addie.

With what a mournful gentle chant the south wind waves the blooming dog-woods and budding trees; even the sun-light is subdued and saddened; and the music of the birds, how plaintive!

My heart is very sad—and the sweet voice of nature with a gentle sympathy soothes my troubled spirit, and enables me to look up with perfect confidence to Him "who giveth and taketh away."

A dear young friend is no more! "A bud of fairest promise, nipped in early morning hour," was Addie, son of Dr. T. M. Jones of Morehouse parish, Louisiana, who died on the 12th of March, 1859, aged eleven years.

Addie was a noble boy with a heart full of warm and generous impulses, one who loved God and feared to do evil. He was a faithful child, a regular attendant at the Sabbath-school, well much beloved by his young companions, who will long remember their gentle friend.

He calmly spoke of dying many times during his short illness; said he would see his little brothers who died a few years ago. His only regret for having to die was, he feared his mother would grieve for him. Dear Addie! we will not grieve for you as one lost to us forever; for, we feel assured, that if faithful we shall meet you in the glorious city of God.

Bereaved parents, yours is a weight of sorrow that no sympathy of friends can remove; let me then point you to Jesus, who bids the weary come unto Him; and think not of your dear son as one lying beneath the sod, but as one who is with the Lamb on Mount Zion, where he awaits with his little brothers and sisters to welcome you to the "mansions" prepared for you in the "Father's House." M. A. C.

What am I Fit for?

There is only one method by which a young man can discover what position in life he is best fitted to occupy. He must try. He may be qualified to plan, to lead, to control, or his talent may be simply executive, and of the kind that assists in carrying out the ideas of other men. In either case his aid is needed in the vast and diversified field of labor presented by a great and growing country. The head and the hand are equally requisite in every branch of science and business, in all the pursuits of actual life. If the man who is merely expert of hand stands or seems to stand on a lower level than he who plans largely and wisely, let him not repine at that, for on the plane where his capacities have placed him there is less of responsibility and anxious care than in the higher positions assigned to more powerful and comprehensive intellects. Having found his true place in the great commonwealth of industry, let the young man cling to it, and not allow himself to be tempted by plausible stories and dreams of sudden wealth, into speculations for which he is not fitted.

A Mother's Love.

Some of our readers may recollect a thrilling ballad which was written on the death of a woman who perished in the snow-drifts of the Green Mountains of Vermont. That mother bore an infant on her bosom, and when the storm waxed loud and furious, true to a mother's love, rent her garments and wrapped them around her babe. The morning found her a stiffened corpse, but her babe survived. The babe grew to manhood, and became the speaker of the Ohio Senate. How thrilling must be his thoughts of that mother, if he be a true-hearted man. How deep a mother's love. How many a mother in these who would die for her son? Let sons, when far away from home, on the land or on the sea, when the eye of no mother is upon them, remember her love and be restrained by it from entering the path of vice. Let them say nothing, do nothing which a mother would not approve, and they will never bring her grey hairs with sorrow to the grave.

Look to the Littles.

The atomic theory is the true one. The universe is but an infinite attrition of particles. The grandest whole is resolvable to fine dust; or, as the ditty has it—

"Little drops of water and little grains of sand, Fill the mighty ocean and form the solid land."

So with character, fortune, and all the concerns of life—the littles combined, form the great bulk. If we look well to the disposition of these, the sum total will be cared for. It is the minutes wasted, that wound the hours and mar the day. It is the pennies neglected, that squander the dollars. The majority of men disdain littles—to many, fractions are "vulgar" in more senses than the rule implies. It is apt to be thought indicative of a narrow mind and petty spirit to be scrupulous about littles. Yet from littles have sprung the mass of great vices and crimes. In habits, in manners, in business, we have only to watch the littles, and all will come out clear. The smallest tendency to evil-thinking or evil-doing, left unguarded may wreck character and life. No ridicule should dissuade us from looking to the littles. The greatest and best of men have not been above caring for the littles—some of which, have to do with every hour and every purpose of our lives.

The Family Man.

We like sometimes, on our evening journey homeward in public conveyances, to pick out the happy family men; and they are by no means so rare as sour selfish people would have us believe. It gives us a thrill of delight to see in their hands a picture-book, or toy, or bonquet; for well we know the happiness these (so called) "trifles" bring to the expecting fireside circle. And well may a man treasure his fireside comforts; well may he remember those who make toil light to him, and greet him with loving hearts and pure arms from the blighting, contaminating influences, which surround the solitary, yearning, unloved man in a great city. Well may he throw himself down on the sofa and draw a long breath of relief, as the iron hand of labor and trade is lifted from his heart, and the doors are flung wide open for love to enter. Well may he—like a miser heart-mad over happy moments, ere death's shadow fall on his threshold, and he wander through desolate rooms—familiar, yet strange, fearfully strange! followed by little pattering feet, that wander up and down through the long day, in misery and perplexity, making her whose loss shall be greater and greater each day to the motherless. Oh, ye who have happy homes; who know not the desert void when the good-night blessing is given and taken; into whose face clear, innocent eyes look lovingly, talk and play and labor with such blessings as these. FANNY FERN.

Vulgarity.

We would guard the young against the use of every word that is no perfectly proper. Use not profane expression—allude to no indecency that would put to blush the most sensitive. You know not the tendency of habitually using indecent and profane language. It may never be obliterated from your hearts. When you grow up you will find at your tongue's end some expression you would not say for any money. By being careful, you will save yourself a great deal of mortification and sorrow. Good men have been taken sick, and become delirious. In these moments they have used the most vile and indecent language imaginable. When informed of it, after a restoration of health, they had no idea of the pain they had given their friends, and stated that they had learned and repeated the expressions in childhood, and though years had passed since they had spoken a bad word, the early impression had been indelibly stamped upon the heart. Think of this, ye who are tempted to use improper language, and never disgrace yourselves.

Humorous.

South Wickedness.

Rev. Henry Giles, in a recent lecture, spoke of Irish wit and humor as displayed by the educated classes and by the peasantry. Sheridan's wit was scathing, burning, with an element of ferocity; the social wit of Sheridan was sportive; Canning's was keen and bitter, as when the curate was anxious to have him quote his sermon, and could elicit from him nothing but the remark that it was short.

"O yes!" said the curate; "I am careful not to be tedious."

"But, sir, you did not succeed," said Canning; "you were brief, but you were tedious also."

Curran's wit was the ideal of fancy and oddity, as when he remarked of an Irishman in Hyde Park, who kept his tongue thrust out of his mouth, "that he was probably trying to catch the English accent!"

The amusing bulls of Sir Boyle Roche were alluded to. He was not only witty in his blunders, but in his correction of them. Once, after exclaiming in Parliament, "Why should we do any thing for posterity? What has posterity done for us?" he explained himself by remarking "that by posterity he did not mean our ancestors, but those who are to come after us!"

Sir Jonah Barrington said of Lord Norbury that he had a hand for everybody, but a heart for nobody. That was a fearful jest of Norbury's, on sentencing to death a thief who had stolen a watch. "You made a grasp at time, my lad, but, egad, you clutched eternity."

The wit of the peasant was illustrated by the remark of a highwayman on being told by a gentleman that he never gave alms to strangers. "Sure, then, your honor will never relieve an angel."

A doctor, retained in court as a witness, complained to the judge that if he was kept from his patients so long they might recover in his absence! But bulls are not confined to Ireland. Sir Isaac Newton made a practical bull, when, having made a hole in his door for his cat to enter, he also made a smaller hole for his kitten. A story was told of a priest, who, it being Friday, on which of course people are not allowed to eat meat, had just helped himself to a whole salmon, with the remark: "It is a fine day with me, gentlemen," when a guest fellow, with red hair, reached across the table, and, cutting the fish in two, helped himself, with the remark: "Bad luck to ye, do ye think I'm a soul to be saved but yourself?"

Gen. Jackson.

It was during the second term of Gen. Jackson that he stopped at a public house, while on his way from Nashville to Florence, Alabama, and "thereby hangs a tale." He was the guest of Mr. Samuel Wormely, as fine a specimen of an old Virginian as you will find between the rising and the setting sun. A large company was present, and many were being introduced. To host presented two of his sons-in-law in the following manner.

"General, allow me to introduce my son-in-law, Samuel P. Walker, who is a nephew of James K. Polk. General allow me to introduce another son-in-law, Adley O. Harris, once a brother-in-law of James K. Polk.

In the corner of the room sat a wag, who had either eaten too much or drunk too much: rising from his seat, he said:

"General, allow me to introduce myself, Michael R. Moore—I married Kate, the daughter of old John Miller; give me your corn-stealer."

Well, there was a laugh, long and loud, in which the General heartily joined, while extending his corn stealer.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

IN THE MEADOW.—BY EMMA ALICE BROWNE.

Sitting on a clover-bank,
Pretty, simple, little Jessie
Dreams of wealth, and splendid rank;
Maple shadows, cool and trashy,
Keep the maiden from the sun,
Sitting, when her work is done,
On a breezy bank of clover,
Dreaming of her high-born lover;
Down yon woodland alley dim,
Yon may catch a glimpse of him,
Lincoln coat, and scarlet plume,
Gay beside the laurel's gloom;
Up and down he paces slow,
Waiting for the light to go—
Waiting in the laurel shade,
For the twilight—and the maid.

On the bank of purple clover,
Still she lingers dreaming over
All the sayings of her lover—
"Thou shalt be a lady fine,
In a palace by the sea,
And thy velvet robes shall shine
With the gems I give to thee.
Thou shalt have a silver lute,
And a sweet-voiced bird to sing—
Golden salvers of rare fruit
Lovely youths to thee shall bring."
So his dreams on, saying over—
"I am happy—I am blest—"
Till the sun dips in the sea,
And the moon rains all her light
Westward—swimming goldenly.
"I am happy! I am blest!
Stars and vapors sweep the sky,
They are dimmer than his eye,
They are paler than his cheek;
I for love of him would die—
And he loves me—it is best!"

Dream on, pretty, artless maiden,
Sing thy heart out joyance-laden;
Sing thy bliss out to the stars,
Watching thro' night's golden bars,
(Lattice of an olden date,)
Sing thy soul out—sorrows wait!
Willows of the world will keep
Sunshine from thee, by-and-by;
All forlorn thy love shall weep,
"Falsely! falsely!" Thou wilt die;
But a lady, all in white,
With a hungry look of woe
In her eyes, thy ghost shall go,
Trailing burial garments slow,
Up and down the haunted chambers
Of that palace by the sea—
Vexing his unblessed sleep,
With the broken vows of yore,
Thou shalt walk for evermore!

TWO YOUNG MEN.

MR. EDITOR: I have concluded to give a short history of two young men, whom I knew in the State of Alabama, in the year 1843. They were aged—one, nineteen, the other seventeen years. One was a member of the Church, the other not religious. Both were admitted to the best society.

In the fall, the irreligious one had business in the city of W——; and, in returning, stopping near the city with his wagon, concluded to have a little sport; hence, he took the liberty of stoning a house and using language unbecoming a gentleman anywhere.

The gentleman returning home a little after night, learned from his family what had taken place; and, determined to let the law have its due course, he sent a person to his camp to learn his name and residence, and finding he was a citizen of the county, he was let pass unmolested.

The young man, however, gave the name of the other, who resembled him in some respects—the color of the hair, and stature.

This occurrence took place on Friday night, and the District court was to meet on Monday following, where this man intended justice to be meted out to this offender of propriety He appeared, and laid the case before the Grand Jury, giving the name. An old gentleman on the jury remarked, he knew the young man well, and could not believe that he had been guilty of the act of stoning a house and using vulgar language; stating, at the same time, that he was a consistent member of the church, and he would find out and be responsible for him. So no action was had in the case.

A few days after this occurrence, he met the young man and interrogated him as to the time he was in the city of W——last, and after learning this, he inquired who, from the neighborhood, was down at such a time. This question was answered. Now he went on to state why he inquired so minutely.

The young man accused was, at the time, attending a Presbyterian Camp-meeting.

Before the next term of the Court, the offender left the county, and the next Spring fled from the State for his personal good.

The other continued to reside in the same community, was appointed a class-leader, and, in 1847, was recommended for license to preach, which the Quarterly conference granted, and recommended him to the traveling connection, in less than ten miles from the place of stoning the house. He was received and transferred to the West, and has been filling regular appointments ever since. He has filled two Missions, two Circuits, two Stations, three years on a District, and now in charge of another. He served as a delegate at the last Session of the General Conference. Hundreds have been converted and brought into the church under his ministry. He now lives in the minds of thousands; while the other, if alive at all, is probably an outcast.

Piety and consistency of character in a church member will always give friends and character, which will not be blighted by a single adverse blast.

Here are two, who had equal advantages: one is a blessing to the world; the other, a blot on society. ADAMS.

TO-NIGHT.

Over the valley, over the hill,
Over the merrily-gushing rill,
Over the desert, over the lea,
Somebody or other is praying for me—to-night.

Over the ocean—rolling away,
Under the Night-Queen's mystical sway,
Knelt in his bark on the sounding sea,
Somebody or other is praying for me—to-night.

Locked in the closet, locked in the cell,
Deep in the woodland's shadowy dell,
Under the boughs of an Indian tree,
Somebody or other is praying for me—to-night.

Lo! by the temple, chequered with gray,
Mantled with ivy, type of decay,
Lo! by the hearthstone, pleasant to see,
Somebody or other is praying for me—to-night.

Over the valley, over the hill,
Over the merrily-gushing rill,
Over the river, over the sea,
Somebody or other is praying for me—to-night.

FINE OLD BOYS.

Talk about the "gravity becoming to age" as much as you will, but blessed is the man who can keep his heart green and gay after the frosts of life's winter have got into his hair. Your fine old boy is always popular. Children like him and he likes children. On the other hand, your austere venerables who never laugh, are things of dread, in fact, bogies to the rising generation. Youngsters prefer the fine old boy who frolics with them to the grim old fogy who frowns at their antics, for the same reasons that they enjoy preserves and make wry faces at pickles. Why should not the heart of an old man be merry, we should like to know? Why should not his eye twinkle with good humor, and his conversation abound with pleasant anecdote? Is it because he is near the end of his journey? Surely not, for to be genial, hopeful, happy, are signs of a clear conscience and a firm trust in the future. A sour old man may be a pattern of all the virtues, but certainly a Christian sugar coated and full of the milk of human kindness is much more like a Christian than one of the sour elder class. One suspects the Pharisee where gravity is pushed to such a painful extreme as to preclude a joyous laugh. The fine old man who does his duty conscientiously, has a right to laugh. Why, forsooth, should he go to his grave like

"A slave scourged to his dungeon," when he has every reason to approach it.

"Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch Around him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

A WORD TO HUSBANDS.

Has any body ever written upon the responsibility which rests upon a husband with regard to his education of his wife?

Of course we know what you will say about her being supposed to have "finished her education" before marriage, and all that; and yet you and we know that she begins as new an education with him as if she had never seen the alphabet. His views, his feelings, his ideas, are they nothing to her, if she loves him? Years after, when they who "knew her as a girl" come to talk with the matron, do they not find her husband reflected in every sentence, either for good or evil? Of course, the more strongly a woman loves, the more completely is her own identity absorbed in her husband's. This is a point which is too much neglected by married men. A good husband is almost certain to have a good wife; and if she be not so good as he could wish" at the commencement of their married life, he can soon educate her up to the proper mark. And, on the other hand, he can so educate her down as to render his home a purgatory, and perhaps bring upon himself and his family the greatest agony and keenest pangs of disgrace which a husband or children can feel.

Garden, Farm, and Plantation.

Agricultural Items.

The Texas ranch of Major Leland, recently of the Metropolitan Hotel, New York, has a frontage of two miles on the Guadalonpe River, and comprise ten thousand acres. The stock comprises 3000 sheep, 750 head of cattle, 250 horses and mules, a celebrated race-horse, working oxen, and a thousand hogs, goats, etc. The purchase amounted to $106,700, the largest sale ever made in Texas of any stock farm.——The Ohio Cultivator says that the grass lately introduced into this country and called by some honey-blede, is only the German millet, which in some soils has been found to be a very valuable forage plant. They are selling the seed in some places at nine dollars a bushel, calling it a new grass, when, if you ask for it by its proper name, German millet, or Hungarian grass, it can be had for two dollars.——The Massachusetts State Board of Agriculture has sold to John Merryman, President of the Maryland Agricultural Society, two cows and a two-years' old heifer of the Hereford breed for $500. At the last meeting of the Board, Messrs. Atwater, of Springfield, Merston, of Barnstable, and Prof. Clark, of Amherst, were appointed a committee to consider and report on the subject of improving the breed of horses in the State.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

REV. WILSON W. JENKINS died at his residence, in St. Landry parish, La., February 5th, 1859, aged 37 years. He was born in Jackson county, Ala.; emigrated to Arkansas in 1836; professed religion and joined the Methodist Church in 1834; commenced preaching and joined the Mississippi Conference in 1842; was, I think, in the bounds of the Louisiana Conference when it was set off from Mississippi. In 1846, where he continued to travel until failing health obliged him to locate, in 1852; was married to Mrs. Mary Bentley, February 14th, 1851, in Tensas parish; removed in 1853 or '54 to St Mary's parish, and thence, a year or so ago, to the place at which he died. Bro. Jenkins was a Sugar-planter in the Attakapas. We think it due to him, and to the cause of God, especially in that country, to record it here, that, on one or two occasions, during the rolling season—as too many other professors of religion have done, while engaged in the same business—he yielded to what to him deemed a necessity, and suffered the work of sugar-making to be continued on the Sabbath. Of this, however, as the writer has every reason to believe, he afterwards heartily repented, and no more permitted anything of the kind, on his plantation, on the Sabbath day. Bro. Jenkins was much afflicted with asthma for several years before his death, and in consequence, did not keep up regular appointments, though he preached often; and, when his health would permit, was always ready to do his part in this way, whenever occasion required. He was a good preacher, and sometimes eloquent and powerful. While hospitable to all, he took great pleasure in entertaining the weary itinerants, who might care to rest a few days or to spend a night with him; his hand and heart were ever open to these. To the cause of God he gave liberally. His last illness was protracted and painful; but through all, grace was his support. He was permitted to retain his consciousness to the very last; knew when he was dying; expressed himself as ready for the change. Calmly and affectionately taking leave of wife and children, he bid them love and serve God faithfully, and meet him in heaven. His exhortation to those present, and his message left for absent friends and kindred, were in substance the same—to live for God and heaven, and meet him there at last. The dying words of the sainted McKendree were his; raising his hands together, twice he repeated them: "All is well! all is well!" and in a moment more he was sleeping sweetly in death. May the widow, orphan and kindred of our deceased friend and brother be enabled now, in affliction, to cast all their care upon Him who careth for them, and find that He is to them indeed "a very present help in trouble." P. M. G.

Minden, La., March 25th, 1859.

WILLIAM STEWART died at his residence in Jefferson county, Miss., 1st March, 1850, aged 44 years. He was born in Gloucester county, New Jersey, May 14th, 1814. In December, 1839, he came to Fayette, Jefferson county, Miss., and began business. A man of indomitable energy, he fully succeeded in all his labors, making his life useful and respected. For several years he had been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; and loved and sustained its doctrines—punctual in attendance, prompt in rendering aid, and observant of its rules. It was not until August, of last year, while attending a protracted meeting at Fayette, that he was fully made certain of his acceptance and adoption into the family of God; when his soul was filled with unutterable joy and peace. While struggling at the altar, God blessed him and his wife with power from on high, and put new songs in their lips. He was attacked with pneumonia, and in a few days was added to its many victims. During his sickness, though suffering intensely, his soul was lifted in prayer and praise. In the midst of his sufferings he frequently repeated words of scripture, expressive of his trust and hope in God. The last hours of his life, when his mind was rational, were full of submission and trust. W. G. MILLSAPS.

Fayette, Miss.

SISTER MARY JEFFERSON departed this life Jan., 30th, 1859, at her residence in DeSoto parish, La. She was born in Georgia, April 10th, 1798; married to Thomas Jefferson Dec. 22d, 1814. She professed religion September 7th, 1834, and joined the Missionary Baptist Church. Though a Methodist in principle at the time of her conversion, yet, to satisfy the wish of her husband, she united with that Church, in which she continued an exemplary member. A few minutes before she breathed her last, a friend said, "Jesus has come for you;" she exclaimed, "Yes! there He is, and the holy angels with Him;" and then sang "Happy day, when Jesus washed my sins away." She was a devoted wife, an affectionate mother, a kind mistress and a charitable neighbor. She leaves five children and many friends to mourn her loss. J. F. SCURLOCK.

FRANCES E. BEVEL, daughter of Mrs. Cathron E. Bevel, was born February 22, 1853, and died March 8, 1859. About two years ago, her father died, leaving little Fanny to the care of her mother. Perhaps the most prominent trait in her character, was a disposition always to speak the truth. The flower, just opening on earth, has been transplanted to unfold its loveliness in fairer climes above. J. C. HUCKABEE.

JOHN CRARY, infant son of F. U. and L. Suzette Sadler, died near Fort Pike, La., on the 12th March, 1859, aged two weeks.

Thy days, my little one, were few,
An angel's morning visit,
That came and vanished with the dew—
'Twas here—'tis gone—where is it?
Yet, did'st thou leave behind thee
A clue for love to find thee. MOTHER.

MRS. A. M. LOWE, died on Tuesday, March 22d, at her residence near Livingston, Madison county, Mississippi, aged sixty-two years. B. F. CROWELL.

AT A REGULAR COMMUNICATION of BOWEN LODGE, No. 241, held March 17th, 1859, the following Resolutions were offered and adopted:

WHEREAS in the dispensation of an all-wise providence, it has pleased the Great Architect of the universe to remove from us our worthy and highly esteemed brother, ELIJAH SIMMONS, who departed this life February 20th 1859;

BE IT RESOLVED, That the members of this Lodge do mourn and deeply lament the loss of one, whose affection and friendship were so firmly impressed upon the hearts of his brethren that his death has caused a vacancy that time can never fill.

BE IT RESOLVED, That we sympathize with the bereaved family of the deceased and tender them our condolence in their sad affliction; and, although the banner of death waves over us in gloomy triumph, and has broken a link in the chain of our social intercourse, we believe the breach will be repaired in the Grand Lodge above, where the Supreme Architect of the universe presides.

BE IT RESOLVED, That we wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days, and that an eulogy or funeral address be delivered at this place, in testimony of our high appreciation of our worthy brother. JOHN H. MYERS, W. M.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give in our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, use that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.
CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.
[For the Conservative.]
Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.
DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family physician.
On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount prescribed. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. So, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

ARMINIANISM AND CALVINISM.

God's Eternal Decrees.

"God from all eternity did, by the most wise and holy counsel of His own will, freely and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass; yet, so as thereby God neither is the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures, nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established."

"Although God knows whatsoever may or can come to pass upon all supposed conditions, yet hath He not decreed anything because He foresaw it as future, or as that which would come to pass upon such conditions."

"God's decrees are the wise, free, and holy acts of the counsel of His will, whereby from all eternity He hath, for His own glory, unchangeably fore-ordained whatsoever comes to pass in time, especially concerning angels and men." Confession and Catechism.

Let us now see what Calvinistic expositors and standard writers say, and how they understand these articles. That God must have decreed all future things, is a conclusion which necessarily flows from His fore-knowledge, independence, and immutability. The fore-knowledge of God will necessarily infer a decree: for God could not fore-know that which would be, unless He had decreed they should be." Why could He not fore-know that moral agents would do? Is this not a gratuitous assumption, and an irreverent restriction of the Divine omniscience? I think so.

The same writer continues: "If God would be an independent being, all creatures must have entire dependence upon Him; but this proves undeniably that all their acts must be regulated by His sovereign will." Again: "If God be of one mind, which none can change, he must have unalterably fixed everything in his purpose, which He effects in His providence." Once more: The decree of God relates to all future things, without exceptions. Whatsoever is done in time was fore-ordained before the beginning of time." Rev. W. Shaw's Authorized Expositions.

Calvin says, Institutes, Book I., Chap. 14, § 3, that "Nothing can happen but what is subject to His knowledge and decreed by His will." Again, says Calvin, book 3., Chap. 13, § 6, "It is evident that all things come to pass rather by ordination and decree" than foreknowledge.

Dwight, in his Theology, says, "All things, both beings and events, exist in exact accordance with His purpose, pleasure, and what is commonly called the decree of God." Dr. J. Dick, in his Theology, says, "The decrees of God relate to all future things, without exception. Whatsoever is done in time was fore-ordained before time." Dr. Hill, an eminent Calvinist, in his Divinity, says, "The characteristic feature of the Calvinistic system is that entire dependence of the creature upon the Creator, which it uniformly asserts, by considering the will of the Supreme Being as the cause of everything that now exists, or that is to exist at any future time." Calvin says, "Every action and motion of every creature is governed by the hidden counsel of God, so that nothing can come to pass but what was ordained of Him." Vol. 1, page 170, Calvin's Institutes.

Finally, for the present, we quote from Calvin, Vol. 1. That man fell, in consequence of the decree of God, we prove thus: Surely, if God had not willed the fall, He could, and no doubt would, have prevented it. But He did not prevent it; ergo, He willed it. And, if He willed it, He certainly decreed it; for the decree is nothing else but the seal and ratification of His will." With these views, agree Edwards, Zanchius, Toplady, Chalmers and Emmons, all men of renown in the Calvinistic host.

The substance of these plain statements is, that:

1. Whatsoever comes to pass in time, was decreed unconditionally and unalterably before time.

2. Whatsoever comes to pass in time, comes to pass because it was decreed before time.

3. Nothing can be, but what was decreed; and what was decreed cannot fail to be; and it cannot fail to be, because decreed.

This, to an Arminian, seems clearly and logically to make God the author of sin. I know the Calvinists disclaim this; but this disclaimer by no means relieves the embarrassment of the Arminian's mind, when he reads the statements of the articles and standard expositors. This disclaimer greatly increases his embarrassment, by placing the Calvinist in the attitude of believing what appears to be a palpable contradiction, namely that God did cause all things and yet did not cause sin. It is as though one should say, Lycurgus made all the laws of Sparta, yet in such a way that there were many laws of Sparta which Lycurgus did not make! Does not the absurdity appear? Then look again. "God decreed whatsoever comes to pass;" but sin has come to pass, therefore God decreed sin. "God's decree," says Calvin, "is the necessity of things;" but sin is something; therefore God's decree is the necessitating cause of sin. This looks logical to an Arminian, and he sees no satisfactory logical escape.

The Arminian thinks that the cause of this apparent contradiction arises out of another contradiction, which Calvinists hold, to wit: that the volitions of free beings can be necessitated. Dr. Dick says, "It is as impossible to avoid our volitions, as it is to pluck the sun out of the firmament." This doctrine is also sustained by the erroneous Calvinistic idea of fore-knowledge. It is this: "What God does fore-know will undoubtedly take place. Hence, then, the actions of men are as unalterably fixed from eternity, as if they had been the subject of an immutable decree."—Dr. Dick. The Arminian's reply is this: The actions of men will not come to pass because they are fore-known; but they are fore-known because they will come to pass. The free actions of men are clearly reflected back in the mirror of the Divine omniscience, they are not projected forward from the engine omnipotence.

VERITAS.

CATALOGUE OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

There are at present twenty-five apartments and thirteen transcribers, besides attendants, engaged on the compilation of the British Museum Catalogue. The new number of the Edinburgh Review gives an interesting paper on the subject; the writer commences by likening an attempt at reviewing the new catalogue to that of writing an architectural essay on the Chinese wall, a brick in this instance being a specimen of the building and a comprehension of its real extent, in fully realizing what that mystery a million means, that appearing to be about the number of entries to be contained in this catalogue: the portions at present in the reading-room consist of 572 volumes, A to G, and 405 of the supplement, H to Z, containing only accessions since 1846; when H to Z, of the main catalogue, is ready the whole will be incorporated. These 977 volumes do not by any means represent the approach which has been made toward the completion of the work. Titles for all the immense accessions between 1838 and 1846 are written, and ready for insertion, and since it appears by a return dated June 30, 1853, that only one-fifth of the works in the library then remained to be catalogued, and the labor has never been relaxed, it follows that the task cannot be very far from its fulfilment. The writer surmises that in three or four years more the general catalogue will be completed.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH, IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

We ought to have and we may have a flourishing society in this city. We need a large and handsome church on a convenient site. Our present house is neat within, and well filled every Sabbath with as fine looking a congregation as can be found anywhere. But it has an unprepossessing exterior, and its location is peculiarly unfortunate. It is too remote from "The Avenue," as Pennsylvania Avenue is generally styled. But there is a greater fault than that about its situation. Everybody who visits Washington goes to see the Patent Office, and everybody else has heard of that magnificent structure. I pass it several times a day, and never fail to gaze at its pure marble and elegant proportions with enthusiastic admiration. It is beautiful beyond description in the sunlight, and more beautiful in the light of the moon. It occupies two squares, and running across Eighth street, divides it. If you go up Eighth street from the Avenue, you come against the Patent Office, and are stopped; you will imagine that you had traveled to the end of that street. But walk half round the building, and you will get into the other part of Eighth, and presently will reach the Metropolitan Southern Methodist Church. A street thus cut asunder, or blocked up in the middle, cannot be of much importance; it is indifferently built, is not lighted with gas, and is unfrequented. You may walk about the city day after day during a year, and never discover our church or even the street on which it fronts. If you get directions, and start forth in pursuit of it on Sabbath, you will wander around and around the Patent Office, and acknowledge that you are lost, as did Rev. Dr. M. and Y. last Sunday. "Where is the church of which you are pastor?" This humiliating question is often put to me by an old citizen. If you only get there, you will be seated in as comfortable a pew (free, however,) and among as genteel a crowd as you are accustomed to, from whatever place you may hail. But the getting there is the difficulty. Now we wish to erect a larger, more attractive edifice, in a lot accessible to the Avenue, surrounded by handsome buildings, and in a well known part of the city. Our brother, Smithson, who has the largest ideas about Southern Methodism at the Capitol, has his eye on a site opposite the Patent Office, where it will no longer throw us into obscurity, but will serve as our "sign-board." A grand sign-board it will be, and built by Federal funds, will cost us nothing. On another side of us will be the Post Office Department, occupying a square, and regarded by many men of taste as the most elegant edifice in the United States. With such surroundings, we cannot escape observation. But we must have money to carry out this design; and after begging a little, we have devised, or rather Brother S. has, two admirable schemes for raising the needed sum. One is the book of sermons by ministers of our connection, many of them men of eminence, and the other is the great picture of the last General Conference, about which I will write more hereafter. I will mention a few reasons why the whole Southern Church should feel interested in our prosperity, and help us:

Washington is a city set on a hill that cannot be hid. As the metropolis of this Union, it fixes the gaze of the country and of the world. Here gather a large transient population from all sections of our own land and from all nations of the earth. These possess a more than ordinary amount of intelligence and influence. Here surely should fly the flag of Southern Methodism. All who resort hither should learn that there is a numerous and influential denomination, Methodistic in doctrine and polity, who intermeddle not with the laws of the States concerning slavery, but preach the gospel to master and slave, inculcating the apostolic precepts on their respective duties in this relation. This is argument number one. While every other phase of religious belief and ecclesiastical government is here represented, let not what we believe to be the purest and most scriptural type fail to be exhibited. This is a matter of common interest to the whole church.

There is a small band of Methodists in this city who were raised in the South, are bound to that section by the strongest ties of affection and interest, and are firmly convinced that the holding of slaves according to the laws and usages of those States is in no sense or degree a sin. They look on abolitionism, especially when adopted as an aggressive principle by the church, and propagated with the high sanctions of conscience and the enthusiasm of religion, as a most mischievous fanaticism, an invasion of the rights and disturber of the peace of a large portion of the Confederacy, a fomenter of strife among Christians, and a special drawback to evangelical labors among the colored people. They are unwilling, therefore, to be members of the Northern branch of the M. E. Church, because the established policy of that organization is to war against slavery as it exists in the South. They have resolved that, however far, they will be a society in connection with the church whose principles and movements they approve and sympathize with. That is argument number two. We must wish them well, for are they not our brethren?

Methodism is strong through the South. Many of her sons from that section come to this city, some to be permanent residents, others to spend several years, though they still claim the South as their home; and visitors, to stay only a few months. They are members of Congress, clerks in the different departments of agent, seekers after office, claimants on the Federal Treasury—for a thousand and one reasons either on their own behalf or for others—reporters to newspapers, visitors from curiosity and pleasure, &c., &c. Their piety is in jeopardy here. I will not indulge in sweeping charges of immorality against our Congressmen or the other temporary residents of the Capital. There is too much vice here as elsewhere, and many causes help to aggravate the evil in this city. But many men who cannot be drawn into vice are too liable to drop their religion, or wear it loosely here. They get away from their homes, their neighbors, their brethren, their classes and sabbath schools, all their old associations. They do not feel settled. They live in society. They mingle with the fashionable seekers after pleasure and show. They do not connect themselves with any society of Methodists, or worship regularly at any place, but fall in occasionally wherever they may happen to find a church convenient. Presently you will hear that they were seen at the theatre, though they had been strict and zealous members of the church at their old homes. They need to be watched over and helped in every possible way, or they will lose their usefulness and their souls. I am writing facts which have come within my own knowledge during the year I have lived here. Let us have an attractive church, of which they cannot be ignorant, and which they will easily find, where shall be sung the songs they love to hear, and preached the gospel as they believe and rejoice in it. Let us make them feel that they are among their own people, between whom and themselves a cordial sympathy prevails. In this way we may keep their lights burning and their loins girded. They will do good in this city, and will return South to be a blessing to the communities from which they have been separated awhile. And many persons who do not profess to be experimental Christians, but who nevertheless admire and honor religion, would attend the sabbath services of our church, though they would never be induced to enter one of the Northern side, or at least not habitually. Brethren of the South, you are helping yourselves in helping us.

We are progressing. Our membership has increased, and so has our congregation. We are finding favor among the people. It is an easier task to raise our annual expenses. The debt on our present building is nearly or quite canceled, and we can probably find a purchaser when we are ready to sell it. Our enterprising Smithson, who is never discouraged, and whose motto is always "Excelsior," is in higher hopes than ever before. The Book of Sermons is popular, and meets with a ready sale. The magnificent engraving is being executed in a style which equals his ambition. Donations are sent us by kind friends, with a spontaneous liberality which excites our warmest gratitude. Ministers and laymen are co-operating in the good cause. We bid them God speed, and pray that they may be richly recompensed by the divine blessing on their estates and their souls, and by the fruits of their pious labor. We look forward to the time when a church shall be reared in this city which will be an honor to Southern Methodism.

REVOLUTIONARY REMINISENCES.

TRAMMELL AND TOWNS AGAIN.

After the circumstances detailed in my former letter, sergeant Towns continued to scour the neighborhood, pillaging, and capturing men and horses wherever he could, until he had succeeded in getting every horse poor Trammell had, save one; and that one he longed to secure. Trammell, now in active service in defence of his country, one night, on parole, had ventured to sleep in his now desolated home; when, just before dawn, they heard the approach of a troop of horse. He had but just time to spring from bed, gather his rifle, leaving his clothes, and knocking one of his toes out of joint against the door, facing as he cleared the door, he sprang behind a corn crib, which stood near the back-door of his cabin, (which of course was empty) and through the cracks he witnessed the eager approach of Towns and his company. As the sergeant took a position, while his men were searching, which rendered him an easy victim to Trammell's rifle, the temptation was so strong that thrice he raised his gun and drew a "bead" on the object of his scorn and hate; but prudence finally triumphed over revenge, and changed his purpose; and he stole noiselessly away, and returned to camp.

Shortly after this, Mrs. Trammell had, by dint of her unconquerable courage and industry, managed to get a grist of corn; and having yet one horse, she put out all the fire in the house, locked up her oldest child, got her corn upon her horse, and took her other child, which was an uncommonly heavy one of several months old, on her lap, and set off for Cook's mill, on Tiger River, eight miles distant. When she arrived all safe in due time, her corn was soon in the hopper, and was not long in being ground out; but, just before the last handful was pulverized, up, rides the dreaded sergeant Towns and his band of Tories. Seeing the horse tied to a limb, he inquired of the miller whose horse that was. Being informed it was Trammell's, he said, "That is the very horse I have been after all this time," gathered him, and away they rode, leaving poor Mrs. Trammell with her heavy babe and bag of meal eight miles from home, and not a mouthful of bread for her or her children to eat! She tied up as much meal in her apron as she could carry, took her child and meal and set off on foot; and, although it may astonish some—perhaps she was not long on the road—found her imprisoned child safe and sound; and soon feasting voraciously upon a smoking piece of corn-bread. After this, (I think at the battle of King's Mountain) sergeant Towns was taken prisoner, and to save his neck took the oath of allegiance to the country, and was in a skirmish or two, before the war closed, with the liberty party.

Soon after peace was concluded, Trammell took the remnant of his little all and emigrated to Georgia, and in the wilderness built and cleared him another home; made a comfortable support, gained money, and grew easy in his temporal circumstances. But, best of all, became religious, as did also his wife. One evening, just at dusk, two travelers called at the gate and asked for lodging; they were taken in. When Trammell rose from his seat at the fire to welcome them at the door, whom should he meet but sergeant John Towns! The momentary pause that ensued was no doubt distressingly painful to Towns; but Trammell called his name and extended his hand, and bade him fear not. "It is true," said he, "that I once intended to kill you on sight; but, thank God, I have learned a better way. Vengeance belongs to God, not to me. Be seated and feel at ease; I will treat you as well as I can." In the course of the evening, as Towns began to feel at ease, and to speak of some heroic achievement with which he was in some sort connected, and began to make himself rather prominent, Mrs. Trammell remarked: "I suppose you remember very well how you treated me at Cook's mill." Poor Towns was silent for the balance of the night, and rose and left before day next morning.

Thomas Trammell died many years ago, full of the glorious hope of immortality and eternal life. His devoted wife followed him but a few years ago, having lived to see her children all raised and comfortably settled in life; and, best of all, nearly all religious and members of the Methodist Church, which she loved so much. She died a good woman, "full of the Holy Ghost and of faith," and they now rest together where war and fightings are over.

W. D. MATTHEWS.

THE DUTY OF OWNING BOOKS.

We form judgments of men from little things about their house, of which the owner, perhaps, never thinks. In early years, when traveling in the West, where taverns were either scarce or, in some places, unknown, and every settler's house was a house of "Entertainment," it was a matter of some importance and some experience to select wisely where you would put up. And we always look for flowers. If there were no trees for shade, no patch of flowers in the yard, we were suspicious of the place.

But, no matter how rude the cabin, or rough the surroundings, if we saw that the window held a little trough for flowers, and that some vines twined about strings let down from the eaves, we were confident that there was some taste and carefulness in the log cabin. In a new country, where people have to tug for a living, no one will take the trouble to rear flowers, unless the love of them is pretty strong—and this taste blossoming out of plain and uncultivated people is, itself, like a clump of bare-bells growing out of a rock. We were seldom misled. A patch of flowers came to signify kind people, clean beds and good bread.

But, other signs are more significant in other states of society. Flowers about a rich man's house may signify only that he has a good gardener, or that he has refined neighbors and does what he sees them do.

But men are not accustomed to buy books unless they want them. If, on visiting a man of slender means, I find the reason why he has cheap carpets, and very plain furniture, to be that he may purchase books, he rises at once in my esteem. Books are not made for furniture, but there is nothing else that so beautifully furnishes a house. The plainest row of books that cloth or paper ever covered is more significant of refinement than the most elaborately carved etagere, or sideboard.

Give me a house furnished with books rather than furniture! Both if you can, books at any rate! To spend several days in a friend's house, and hunger for something to read, while you are treading on costly carpets, and sitting upon luxurious chairs, and sleeping upon down, is as if one were bribing your body for the sake of cheating your mind.

Is it not pitiable to see a man growing rich, and beginning to augment the comforts of home; and lavishing money on ostentatious upholstery, upon the table, upon every thing but what the soul needs?

We know of many and many a rich man's house where it would not be safe to ask for the commonest English classics. A few garish annuals on the table, a few pictorial monstrosities, together with the stock of religious books of his "persuasion," and that is all! No range of poets, no essayists, no selection of historians, no travels or biographies, no select fictions, or curious legendary lore; but, then, the walls have paper on, which cost three dollars a yard! Books are windows through which the soul looks out. A house without books is like a room without windows. No man has a right to bring up his children without surrounding them with books, if he has the means to buy them. It is a wrong to his family. He cheats them. Children learn to read by being in the presence of books. The love of knowledge comes with reading and grows upon it. And the love of knowledge, in a young mind, is almost a warrant against the inferior excitement of passions and vices.

Let us pity these poor rich men who live barrenly in great, bookless houses! Let us congratulate the poor, that in our day books are so cheap that a man may every year add a hundred volumes to his library for the price of what his tobacco and his beer would cost him. Among the earliest ambitions to be excited in clerks, workmen, journeymen, and, indeed, among all that are struggling up in life from nothing to something, is that of owning, and constantly adding to, a library of good books. A little library growing larger every year is an honorable part of a young man's history. It is a man's duty to have books. A library is not a luxury, but one of the necessaries of life.

THE LONDON NEWSPAPERS—THE TIMES.

Nearly sixteen hundred years of our Christian era had elapsed before a single newspaper had appeared in Europe; and the first newspaper was published in England, in 1619, by N. Newberry, in London. It was issued weekly, and called News out of Holland, a title which was very significant of the period of its publication. Before the appearance of the first regular weekly newspaper published in London, which was in 1622, and called the News of the Present Week, great families residing in the country paid correspondents in London for transmitting to them the London news every week. Mr. Whittaker, in his history of Cruven, states that Lord Clifford paid "Captain Robinson five pounds for writing letters of news to his Lordship for half a year." A great number of newspapers came into existence during the civil war, in the time of Charles I, and the Commonwealth; they were in small quarto, published weekly, and bore quaint but significant titles, such as the Parliament Kite, the Scot's Dove, the Secret Owl, etc. Sir Robert L'Estrange commenced the London Gazette in 1661. The first daily newspaper was published in 1709; it was called the Daily Current. About this time the celebrated essays, the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian commenced. The first number of the Tatler was published in April, 1709. The Public Advertiser, in which the Letters of Junius appeared, commenced in 1726. Wilke's North Briton was published in 1762. Perhaps the very earliest provincial weekly paper published in England was the Stamford Mercury, which commenced in 1704; and, singularly enough, it has been uninterruptedly published since that date to the present time, under the same title, and in the same town; and the proprietorship has always been, and is now, in the same family.

We have stated that the Daily Current was the first daily paper published in London (1709.) There were eighteen other papers published in London at that time. Fielding, the novelist, edited the True Patriot, in 1745. In 1771, parliament attempted to punish two printers, for giving names in full in the debates. This practice has not since been interfered with. Of the great London papers at present published, the Public Ledger commenced in 1760, the Morning Chronicle in 1769, the Morning Post in 1772, the Morning Herald in 1780, and the Times in 1788. The Daily News was established in 1846, and is the only daily paper that has stood its ground since 1793.

But to return to the Times, with which our business is at present. We wish to show the astonishing growth of the London daily press by the progress of this leviathan of the newspaper world, this "leading journal" of Europe. We have stated that the Times was commenced in 1788; but Mr. Walter, the proprietor of that journal, had commenced his labors as a journalist on the first of January, 1785, when he published the first number of the Daily Universal Register, at Printing-house Square, the identical locality from whence issue the 50,000 copies of the sixteen mammoth pages of the Times. The title of the paper was changed to the Times in the Spring of 1788. The Daily Universal Register was printed logographically, and so also was the Times for a season, we know not how long. The logographical mode of printing was so much more economical than the mode of printing by the arrangement of single letters, that Mr. Walter said he could, in consequence, sell his paper "over one half-penny under the price paid for seven out of the eight morning papers." The difficulties Mr. Walter experienced in introducing his new mode of composing for the press as well as the history of the Daily Universal Register, are given in the Household Words, for February 27, 1858. Our business is with an early number of its eminent successor. The Times, No. 1113, of the joint series now before us, was printed on a folio sheet of four pages, eighteen inches by twelve. This number contained twenty-four advertisements, of which one was theatrical, and related to Sadler's Wells; one literary, and advertised The Memoirs of Miss Ann Sheldon; five concerned the sale of estates; and nine that of goods and personal property; one called a meeting of creditors; one was a government advertisement, and related to the Victualing office; three related to business concerns; two to distressed debtors, and one was about a lost watch. The other contents of this paper were two columns of an account of the siege of Bender by the Russians in 1770; about half-a-column of foreign news and three-fourths of a column of Parliamentary proceedings, in which Lords Hawkesbury, Heathfield, Cathcart, and Sandwich, and the Duke of Chandos took part in the discussion of a bill respecting the slave trade. The bill was carried by a vote of nineteen against eleven. Lord Bathurst moved an address providing for instructing the slaves in the West Indies in Christianity. This motion was opposed by the Lord Chancellor and the Bishop of London, and defeated.

The House of Commons was not disposed to work, since we are told that the Speaker had attended in four successive days without being able to form a house. There was nothing approaching to what we now call a "leading article." There was a paragraph on the advantages of canals, twenty-four lines on the abolition of the slave trade, and thirty-two lines relating to public schools. There was also two columns of short paragraphs, such as are now furnished by penny-a-liners, relating to the movements of the royal family and the nobility: "the King was unwell, and recommended to drink the Cheltenham waters;" short city articles and ship news; a rumor of war between Russia and Spain—"France cannot aid Spain in consequence of the disturbed state of the whole French nation;" praise of Lord Kenyon as a judge, and for his endeavors "to keep the attorneys in order, from whose advice and interference ninety-nine cases out of every hundred which come before the courts are said to originate." There is also a curious satirical article in the shape of a racing calendar, headed "Sporting Intelligence." In this "calendar" there appears a match between Mr. Sheridan's mare "Old Rip," and Mr. Pitt's colt, "Constitution." The Ordnance stakes were contended for by the Duke of Richmond's "Howitzer" and Mr. Courtney's "Pop-Gun," and the latter was double distanced. The Oude plate was run for by horses belonging to Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Burke, Mr. Anstruther, and Mr. Fox. This has relation to the trial of Warren Hastings. Lord Thurlow's "Nobody" and Sir Pepper Arden's "Somebody" contended for the Roll's stake. Alderman Wilke's old horse "Hypocrisy" walked over the course for the Chamberlain's cup, and the cup given by Thalia and Melpomene was run for by horses belonging to Messrs. Sheridan, Harris, Wroughton, Palmer and others, and won by the first. All these accounts are accompanied with political observations, which were very pertinent no doubt at the time, but have now become dark and obscure as to their application. Mr. Walter, grandfather to the present proprietor of the same name, and M. P. for Nottingham, was prosecuted in 1786 and 1787 for a libel (in the Universal Register) upon Lord Loughborough, and found guilty, we suppose, since he had the prosecutor's bill of costs, £111, 17s. 1d., to pay. This bill is given at length (two columns and a half) in the Times of July 4, 1788, with many sharp comments upon its various items. The writer's indignation is principally directed against Mr. Erskine. The remaining space is filled with some of "Old Bailey" intelligence, prices of stocks, etc. Three per cent. consols are quoted at 74⅜, and four per cents. at 94¾. Bank stock and India stock are mentioned, but the prices are not given. So much for the times of 1788. We are inclined to think, from the specimen before us, that it was even at the commencement of its career, conducted with good judgment, considerable talent, and no small portion of sharp and bitter commentary.

We will now turn to the Times of 1858, and take for our specimen the number of the 14th of May. It is printed upon two sheets of paper, each 48 inches by 36. It is folded into sixteen pages of six columns each, and contains a surface (both sides) of 6,912 square inches, being exactly eight times the surface of the Times of 1788. But, in fact, owing to smaller type being used, and the printing being more compact in the Times of 1858, the latter contains nearly fifteen times as much printed matter as the former. The superficies of each number of the Times and double supplement is equal (on both sides) to 5½ square yards. The circulation is now about 50,000, and the daily surface of printed matter issued by the Times is equal to fifty-five acres and about one-tenth. The Times and double supplement weigh 5½ ounces, and the whole impression consumes about 7½ tons of paper. The ninety-six columns of the Times contain above 23,000 lines, and the type to print the whole consists of about 1,334,000 pieces of metal. The Times of the 14th of May, 1858, and its double supplement contained 2,188 advertisements, which we have classified as follows: Births, deaths, and marriages, 68; business companies, 43; business to dispose of, 85; boarding and lodging apartments, etc., 103; books, music and musical instruments, 236; sales of carriages and horses, 93; educational, religious and charitable meetings, 71; sales of personal property, furniture, etc., 56; exhibitions, theatres, etc., 108; Government and legal notices, 21; houses and estates to sell, 164; to be rented, 247; money wanted or offered, 42; places, situations, and employments wanted, 322; property lost or found, 31; partners wanted, 75; railway advertisements, 44; ships, steamers, etc., 157; servants, assistants, etc., 110; miscellaneous, 102. But perhaps the cui bono of this detail may be inquired about; should it be, we would reply that the answer does not lie very far below the surface. It is very seldom that we have an opportunity of comparing the statistics of an establishment very soon after its commencement with those which it presents nearly three-quarters of a century afterwards. We are fortunate in possessing the means of instituting this comparison between the position of the Times in 1788, and that of 1858. Such an institution as this paper must be greatly productive of either good or evil. We sincerely believe it is the former, and, believing so, we rejoice in its progress and well-deserved success. The Times is one of the great moving powers of the day, and its influence is felt wherever civilized man is found, and felt without being understood wherever even uncivilized man exists.

THE GOSPEL IN ITALY.

"L'Eco Di Savonarola," a monthly gospel tract for Italians, which for thirteen years has been published in London, and circulated generally gratuitously in Italy and wherever the Italian language is spoken, contains several interesting facts in the February number respecting the progress of the gospel in Italy, which the editor has recently visited. He states that there is a religious awakening in that country, which, comparatively speaking, is not inferior to the great revival in the United States. Almost throughout the Sardinian kingdom Churches are organized, the communicants in some towns exceeding two hundred. Religious meetings are numerous, being held on week-day evenings as well as on the Sabbath, and so crowded that it is difficult to gain admission.

The "Buona Novella," the organ of the Waldenses, states that religious meetings in Turin are more numerous than ever, and that the sacred Scriptures are freely distributed and producing beneficial results. "They are no longer forbidden as formerly, and the young and studious are beginning to take delight in them." From the Bible depository of one colporteur in Piedmont, 5951 Bibles and Testaments were sent out last year, 5429 of which were in Italian. The liberal Piedmont journals introduce controversial articles against the Roman Church.

In Tuscany, Lombardy, Venetia, and even in Naples and the Papal States, the Bible is circulated, and the number of Christians is constantly increasing. A count and priest were not long since imprisoned in Rome for their interest in the Bible.

The King of Prussia, during his recent visit to Florence, for four Sabbaths attended Protestant worship in the same chapel where the Medici and other Tuscans met in 1848, for which they were imprisoned and exiled. This has had an excellent effect on the people, as the priests have tried to persuade them that only the poor became Protestants, and that for the sake of obtaining money.

A new religious journal has appeared, called "La Liberta Cattolica," in which the editors propose to combat the theories of the majority of the Sardinian bishops. Thus, notwithstanding the efforts of the Papacy to repress light and truth, the Bible, which is "the religion of Protestants," is making its way, and gaining victories even in the very dominions of the Man of Sin. THE MOUNTAINS OF SCRIPTURE.

MOUNT ARARAT, whereon, says Moses, the ark rested, consists of two peaks, separated by a valley. The Great Ararat rises to a height of 17,210 feet from the level of the sea, and the lesser or little Ararat, to 13,000. The Great Ararat was ascended, after great toil, by Prof. Parrot, in 1829; probably then pressed by the foot of man for the first time since Noah.

Carmel, the scene of the trial between Elijah and the worshipers of Baal, as to whether Jehovah or Baal was God, is the general name of a range of hills extending North-west from the plain of Esdraelon, and ending in a bold promontory on the shore of the Mediterranean, forming the bay of Acre. The extent of the range is six miles, and the greatest height 1500 feet.

Mounts Ebal and Gerizim, in Samaria, rise about 800 feet, having a valley about 250 paces wide between. On these hills was performed the grand ceremony, on the Israelites gaining possession of the land of promise, for which Moses had left directions. Six tribes were placed upon Mount Gerizim to bless the people, and six upon Mount Ebal to curse. In later times the Samaritans built a temple on Mount Gerizim, and the Samaritans still regard it as holy ground.

Mount Hor, on the summit of which Aaron died, is situated in Arabia Petrea, on the confines of Idumea, and rises to the elevation of 3000 feet.

Lebanon, whose renowned cedars are many times alluded to, is the name applied in Scripture to both the Libanus and Anti-Libanus mountains, two parallel ranges, running from North-east to South-west, on the Northern shores of Palestine. The average height of the range is about 10,000 feet.

Mount Moriah, one of the hills upon which Jerusalem was built of old, and the site of Solomon's temple, and the present Mosque of Omer, is about 2000 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and separated from the Mount of Olives by the narrow valley of Jehoshaphat.

The Mount of Olives, sacred as the frequent resort of the Savior for mediation and prayer, derived its name from the number and beauty of its olive trees. It rises about 500 feet above its opposite neighbor Moriah, and is the place of burial of the Jews.

Mount Sinai, where the Lord descended in fire, and gave the commandments to Moses, is a wild, desolate region of granite peaks and precipices, deep ravines and water courses. Its height is 7000 feet, and the length of the whole range is three miles.

THE GREAT EAST INDIAN DOCTOR.

DR. VRIES is, probably, the son of a rich native of Java. In early youth he was sent to Holland to study medicine. He was distinguished at the colleges in that country as a student of remarkable promise, and advantageous offers were made him to remain in Europe. He, however, persisted in returning home, where he remained several years.

His story is, that during that period he devoted himself to a study of the remedial qualities of those East Indian herbs and plants which are not included in the materia medica; and that, after many experiments, he made some remarkable discoveries.

At all events, after an absence of some years, he reappeared in Paris, and announced himself as prepared to cure various diseases which the faculty at present confess to be beyond their skill. Among these was encephaloid cancer. It so happened that the famous musician and musical instrument-maker, Adolf Sax, was suffering from cancer of the lip, which the Paris doctors could not cure. By some means or other the Black Doctor obtained access to him, and cured him. This success, as was natural, made no small stir among the physicians of Paris; one of them, not the least eminent—M. Velpeau—refused to join in the cry of quack, and actually opened the wards of his hospital—La Charite—to the stranger. We hear that he has effected some extraordinary cures there, and that his private practice is already enormous.

The following anecdote concerning him is amusing. We find it in the correspondence of the Express:

"It appears that the Javanese is quite an original character, and holds in contempt—which he does not attempt to conceal—the professional resources of his Parisian contemporaries. He is said lately to have given utterance to a challenge, in broken French, which significantly embodies his views of our greatest.

"'I will go some day,' says the East Indian, 'to find Nelaton, Velpeau, Ricord; I will take them in a carriage with me to the Garden of Plants'—the Zoological Gardens of Paris.

"'Bring here boa, bring cobra capella, bring rattlesnake—ugh!

"'When three terrible serpents come, I say to three great doctors, 'take off coat and shew arm.' I say to boa, 'bite Ricord!' I say to rattlesnake, 'bite Velpeau!' Once bite, they all swell up and die. Me give arm to three serpents, and say 'bite!' But I not swell—I not die; for I ponr on arm little vial—antidote—I cured!"

It is doubtful whether the three princes of science to whom the Black Doctor, (as he is called) offers this challenge will be tempted to accept it, only to establish his triumph. Nor will they be likely to consent, even if the latter should modify his proposition so far as to submit his own arm to the serpents first; but certain it is, pleasantry apart, one fact fills the attention of all who witness the proceedings of this strange personage: he has indubitably cured Sax of a malady which has never been known to forgive. Those who know the circumstances exclaim, "A miracle!"

If the Black Doctor can really cure the cancer, he will deserve and will obtain a reputation and a fortune superior to those of any of his compeers in any part of the world. [Harper's Weekly.]

MYSTERY OF THE AMERICAN LAKES.

Lake Erie is only 60 or 70 feet deep, but the bottom of Lake Ontario, which is 502 feet deep, is 230 feet below the tide level of the ocean, or as low as most parts of the Gulf of St. Lawrence; and the bottoms of Lake Huron, Michigan, and Superior, although their surface is so much higher, are all, from their vast depth, on a level with the bottom of Lake Ontario. Now, as the discharge through the river Detroit, after allowing for the full probable portion carried off by evaporation, does not appear by any means equal to the quantity of water which the three upper great lakes receive, it has been conjectured that a subterranean river may run from Lake Superior and Huron and to Lake Ontario. This conjecture is by no means improbable, and accounts for the singular fact that salmon and herring are caught in all the lakes communicating with the St. Lawrence, but in no others. As the Falls of Niagara must have always existed, it would puzzle the naturalists to say how these fish got into the upper lakes without such subterranean river; moreover, any perpetual obstruction of the river would furnish a not improbable solution of the flux and influx of the lakes.

THE SOUTH-WEST AND HER EDUCATION.

Centenary College of Louisiana.

The development of the South-West is one of the principal features of the time. The flood-tide of North-Western progress has passed; that of the South-West is just beginning to set in. Leaving out other equally infallible indications, the present course of trade is a sufficient evidence of this fact. Immense crops for the last two years, credit and commerce unaffected by the monetary crises which have crippled other quarters, overflowing wealth is now a reality, and its increase, by ordinary providential favor, a certainty. This is not a South-Western opinion merely; it is also that of the Northern press.

The South-West is a growing power in the nation, commercially, intellectually, and politically; and South-Western ideas and character are destined to exercise a controlling influence upon American civilization. In agricultural and commercial resources and prospects, she is without a peer. The rich cotton, sugar and grain lands of Alabama, Mississippi, West and South Tennessee, Arkansas, Texas, and Florida, constitute the most permanently productive interior ever connected immediately with one port. And these, taken as a whole, are in the infancy of development and cultivation. Besides these, the whole of the great Valley of the Mississippi is tributary to the wealth and power of the South-West.

To these, add the commercial advantages of the Gulf of Mexico—the Mississippi River and its tributaries—the city of New Orleans, with its fifty thousand miles of water navigation, and its connections, by railroad and otherwise, with all parts of the Union, including the [illegible] route to California: to say nothing of Cuba, Mexico, and Central America. The immense power resulting from the development of all these resources and advantages, is only a question of time. Every mile of railroad, every new steam-line, and farm and plantation, and mechanical, manufacturing, and commercial investment, but hastens its growth.

New Orleans, in a few more months, will be united by railway with the mouth of the Ohio, and will have a continuous line of railroad to Chicago, and almost to the borders of Lake Superior. She will be within about two days of St. Louis, two and a half of Chicago, within about the same time of Louisville and Cincinnati, and within three and a half days of New York, through Tennessee and Virginia. We shall soon be in railroad connection with Alabama, Georgia, and the whole railroad system in that direction. And, as will be seen in another column, the ultimate connection of New Orleans with San Antonio, via Houston, Texas, is reduced to a certainty.

In other respects, the South-West manifests its characteristic advantages. Medical science, whose center has long been in Philadelphia, is gradually making the Schools of New Orleans her chosen seat. They are now, in the facilities afforded for thorough medical culture, second only to the Schools of Paris; and, with the ægis of the State, and the judicious and patriotic patronage of the people, they bid fair to be ultimately equal to any in the world. The South-Western Press, also, is unsurpassed, if not unequalled, in vitality, freshness, breadth, energy, and power. In these elements, it only represents the youthful, vigorous, and progressive character of South-Western ideas and civilization.

One of the most significant items in the South-West is, that the most magnificent educational enterprises are accomplished in the shortest time. Alabama, with a University already equal to any in the Union in facilities and grade of education, and with an ample endowment, has, in five years, raised nearly a million of dollars for educational purposes, by the private enterprise of the different Churches.

We doubt if, in the whole history of American Colleges, so great an enterprise as that of the Southern University, at Greensboro', Ala., has been accomplished within any thing like so short a space of time. East Alabama Male College, at Auburn, which commenced at the same time, is also a wonderful success.

And, still farther West, Louisiana and Mississippi have, in Centenary College of Louisiana, one of the most elegant, commodious, and costly college edifices in the country—with an able and acceptable faculty, and about two hundred students in attendance; and they are energetically pressing forward in the work of paying the debt contracted for the building, and in raising an endowment fund of $100,000. An agent, Rev. Vernon H. Johnson, was appointed by the last Mississippi Conference for this purpose, and is succeeding encouragingly in his noble work.

Centenary College has pre-eminent claims upon the people of the South-West. Growing rapidly in every thing else, they should not neglect the facilities for the highest and most thorough South-Western Collegiate education. And Centenary College is the principal representative institution outside of Alabama. Founded, and still favored, by the State—turned over to the guardianship of the Methodist Church—with ample buildings—in successful operation—with a large body of Alumni, who are an honor to the institution and the country—its ample endowment is certainly not an open question. Located in the very heart of the region it represents—with the character of its government unobjectionably fixed in the eyes of its constituency—the only institution, too, in the section it represents, prepared to impart a religious and South-Western culture of the best degree—it is the imperative duty, nay, it is the interest and privilege, of the wealthy South-West to develop the highest power of the institution, and to give her sons a home education, harmonious with her own ideas, and pervaded by the elegance, tone and vigor of her own clime, and her own civilization.

The endowment of Centenary is now before the people, and the result is to be a test of the liberality and public spirit of Louisiana and Mississippi, as compared with that of Alabama. Men and women, in that State, have given from $25,000 down. Who will start the endowment of Centenary at that figure?

HUNTSVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, ALA.

A friend, in whose judgment we confide, and who is well acquainted with the facts, furnishes us the following memorandum. Our knowledge extends only to two of the gentlemen named—Dr. Erwin and Rev. G. M. Everhart—of whose fine personal address and moral worth, as well as their ability as educators, we could not say too much:

The Rev. A. R. Erwin, D.D., having purchased of the President (Rev. G. M. Everhart) a moiety of his interest in this institution, has been elected, by the Trustees, "Principal of the Literary Department, and Professor of Natural Science." This distinguished scholar and divine will give character to any institution with which he may be connected.

The Rev. J. Newman Hank, A. M., at present Professor in the Metropolitan Female College, Washington City, has been appointed to a Professorship in the same institution. Professor Hank is a graduate of Dickinson College, and a member of the Baltimore Conference. Mr. Hank's [illegible] and successful experience as a teacher, and his observation as a European traveler and resident in Paris, [illegible] to render his connection with the institution [illegible] fortunate. Both of these gentlemen will enter upon their duty in September next.

These gentlemen will not displace previous ones. The great prosperity of the College renders it necessary to furnish additional facilities in the department of instruction. [Nashville Christian Advocate.

METHODISM IN MISSISSIPPI.

We have received the Minutes of Mississippi Conference, which held, in December last, its forty-third annual session, at Woodville, Miss., Bishop Paine presiding. They are carefully prepared and neatly published, by Revs. W. P. Barton and H. J. Harris. Some of those who composed the body at its first session are still living. Having, at the session preceding, adopted a plan of lay-co-operation, and recommended the General Conference to adopt a uniform plan for all the Conferences, (which was done) at the last session the plan went into operation. Having explained it before in these columns, it is only necessary to say here that one layman or local preacher is elected from each quarterly Conference—homes provided for them as for members of the Conference—and the chairman of the principal Committees having been elected the year before—viz: On Education, Missions, Bible Cause, Church Publications, Ministerial Support, and Sunday-schools—in the afternoon of each day the Conference assembles in Committee of the Whole on one or other of these subjects, at the call of the chairman; and the laymen share equally in the discussion and voting. When the Conference again assembles, the Chairman of the Committee reports. If discussion arises, which is rarely the case, the laymen may participate. Sometimes two or three subjects are discussed the same afternoon—without the rising of the Committee—simply by changing the Chairman. The plan worked well, and gave hearty satisfaction.

Eleven preachers were admitted on trial—one re-admitted—thirteen remain on trial—seven were received into full connection—eleven were reported deacons of one year—ten were elected and ordained elders—fourteen local preachers were elected to deacon's orders, and nine to elder's orders—three located—three were discontinued at their own request—three were reported supernumeraries, and seven superannuated—four had died—one hundred and thirty preachers in connection with the Conference. In connection with the Church, in the bounds of the Conference, there are 32,854 members.

Sharon Female College is an old and established institution of the Conference, and is now more prosperous than ever before, so far as we can learn. Centenary College of Louisiana is the joint property of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences, and is more fully treated in another column. The Conference adopted the New Orleans Christian Advocate, and resolved to co-operate with the other patronizing Conferences in an earnest effort to raise the subscription list to "at least ten thousand." The Conference continued its Book and Tract Society, and the Depository at Vicksburg, and appointed Revs. H. H. Montgomery and J. H. Merrill Agents, who have ever since been actively engaged in the work, assisted, also, by Rev. J. A. Light. It also approved of the Church Evangelist enterprise. The report of the Committee on Missions was an able document, drawn up by Rev. Dr. Thornton, and took ground in favor of increased and enlarged exertions for the evangelization of the colored population, and in favor of reinforcing the China Mission. Conference was only able to pay the superannuated preachers, and the widows and orphans of those who have died in the work, a little less than fifty per cent. of their claims. This caused grief in the Conference. There is no necessity for such a showing in so old and wealthy a Conference as Mississippi. It grows out of the fact that the Conference has heretofore been too generous, in admission on trial, reception into full connection, and in the enforcement of disciplinary requirements upon undergraduates. The ministerial training of the Conference has suffered on these accounts, and the finances, and other things, have suffered in consequence. There is, however, a more active spirit of reform and improvement in the Mississippi Conference, than in any other Conference we have visited. They have determined to put a strict interpretation upon the laws requiring examination both before admission on trial and reception into full connection. Several undergraduates were required to bring up the studies of last year, as well as this, at the next session. The Mississippi Conference, in short, seems determined to adopt that strict guard at the doors, both into the probationary relation, and into that of full connection, without which our ministry is certain to decline, while the Church and country advance. Active measures were taken to bring up the finances this year. The Finance Committee reported a plan, which has been published in this paper, dividing the whole amount estimated as necessary to be raised between the Districts, and again between the circuits and stations of each District, and giving the stewards the charge of its collection. It is hoped that at the next session these claims will all be paid, dollar for dollar.

In missionary matters the Minutes show as follows: Natchez District $3,935,45 — Fayette District, $3,413,75—Greenville District, $1,271,40—Vicksburg District, $1,927,28—Yazoo District, $1,575,48—Paulding District, $293,75—Sharon District, $1,853,45—Covington District, $354.00—Total, $14,535,46. The Mississippi Conference can raise $25,000 easily. It has, no doubt, twenty Churches that could give a thousand each. It has enough to inspire it in this good work, in the fact that it has a worthy missionary, Rev. J. W. Lambuth, and his family, in China, and in the farther fact that it proposes to send another one there, having made arrangements at the last session to raise $1200 for that purpose.

The Chairmen of the following Committees were appointed at the last session for the present year: On Education, B. M. Drake—Missions, J. L. Forsyth—Bible Cause, B. Jones—Church Publications, C. K. Marshall—Ministerial Support, W. P. Barton—Sunday-schools, W. H. Watkins. These Chairmen are to collect information on their respective interests, prepare the body of their reports for adoption; amended or otherwise, in Committee of the Whole at next Conference. Well prepared reports will leave the Committee only the work of considering and adopting proper resolutions.

THE MAILS.

The complaints of irregularity, failures, and losses, are not confined to this section—they come, long, loud, and increasing—from every part of the Union. We are constrained to believe, however, both from recent and long-gone experience, that the worst mismanaged portion of the general postal system is to be found in the South-west, of which New Orleans is the centre. We have been connected with newspapers for five years, and largely dependent, all the time, upon the New Orleans postoffice; and truth compels us to say that, though the regularity and certainty of the whole mail system of the South-west depend upon it, it has all the time failed to give satisfaction. Texas mails, with all their disadvantages, are far more reliable than those of New Orleans and Mobile. We cannot say how long Mobile has been so, but at present it is very unsatisfactory.

We have written these things, after months of patient waiting, hoping, disappointment and injury. From Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, the complaint comes that the Advocate fails to come, or comes at long intervals. Would that the postoffice system were abolished, or the postmasters made elective by the people. This miserable system of party patronage is cursing the country, and shaming heaven and earth, with its corruption. There are good postmasters, we know, and we praise them; but there are bad ones, and we condemn them. There are evils that no postmaster can remedy, the fault being in the negligence or favoritism of Department officers; but the incompetency, negligence, and worse, connected with our postal system, would astound the constituency of the government, could it all be made known. The only remedy is, for the people and press to boldly expose and denounce every known delinquency.

NORTHERN METHODIST DISTURBANCES IN TEXAS.

We regret to chronicle such things, but truth requires it. The Northern Methodist Church, according to the philosophy of Dr. Stevens, as shown by a quotation in our last paper, has been trying to "press Southward" into Arkansas and Texas. For years they have had a few scattered and insignificant people, and a few men called preachers, in Northern Texas and parts of Arkansas, which they have called the "Arkansas Conference." It was a name, which showed well in the papers, but has been, all the time, a worthless and hopeless investment, the people of the country hardly being aware that any such people existed among them. Bonham, Fannin county, Texas, has been a sort of centre. A Conference was held there several years since, Bishop Simpson presiding. Recently another Conference has been held at Timber Creek, in the same vicinity, Bishop Janes presiding; and the results which might have been expected from the first have at length been developed. This calamity has been invoked by them, and not by any means through the influence of Southern Methodists. The strong abolition "deliverances" of the Northern Methodist Church, when known to Southern people, among whom they desire to labor, naturally produces these results. We copy the following account from the Bulletin of this city:

"We perceive by the Bonham (Fannin county) Independent, that a public meeting was recently held there to take into consideration certain developments that have lately come to light in that section, with reference to abolitionism. It appears that there is a society of the 'Methodist Episcopal Church North,' in that section, and that the upholders and members of it are inimical to slavery, and avow their design of extirpating it. It appears further that there are several ministers, and a Conference of them, which at the time of the indignation meeting was in session at Timber Creek. A committee of fifty was appointed to wait on the Conference and warn the members not to prosecute further the business of the Conference. It is stated that Bishop Janes presided. The committee waited on the Conference and Judge S. A. Roberts read the proceedings of the meeting to the Bishop and ministers. The committee and those who went with them, some two hundred, were altogether courteous to the Conference. Two annual Conferences, it seems, have been held, and at the late one resolutions in opposition to slavery were offered. The committee reported to a subsequent meeting at Bonham, and resolutions were adopted to the effect that the upholders of the Society must cease to propagate anti-slavery doctrine either publicly or privately, that all Bishops and ministers of that or any similar Society must immediately leave and never return; and that if any of the members cannot act up to the spirit of the resolutions, they must leave the country, or make preparations to do so within sixty days. A Vigilance Committee was appointed to see that the resolutions were complied with, and in case of non-compliance to enforce them by Lynch law. What course was adopted by the Conference is not stated. (We learn from the Texas Advocate that the Conference yielded. Ed. N. O. Ad.)

"The meetings of the citizens of Bonham opposed to the Conference appear to have been conducted with moderation, while a firm determination was evinced to protect themselves from the influences referred to. The first resolution deplored the necessity which impelled them to adopt this course of action."

SUBTERRANEANISM IN NEW YORK.

New York, March 31, 1859.

Subterraneanism is sinking. Mike Walsh, the embodiment of rowdyism, the impersonation of Young Irish-America, has succumbed; whether as the immediate result of his own vices, or as the victim of such violence as his career has served to promote, none can tell. In either case, retribution has come to strike terror into the hearts of the lawless and profane. Tell it not in Gath: Mike Walsh was a Representative of a Legislative and Congressional district of the city of New York, and his constituents made no complaint that he did not represent them as they are!

What means this cropping out of New York Subterraneanism—do you ask? This, I think, in part—the light of a better day is beginning to penetrate its terrible depths. Good citizens have been startled into the consciousness of the perils around and beneath them. Forty-two murders in 1858, mostly traced to unlicensed dram-shops; eight thousand paupers, leaving property and character in keeping of rum-sellers, and casting their poor carcasses on the charity of honest industry; thousands on thousands of mere children and youth demoralized and incarcerated; our political and judiciary systems the prey or sport of the very men who drug and demoralize the people—these, and like dreadful realities, have flashed upon the vision of men who have everything at stake here, and they are measurably awake, at last, to the fact and the causes of wide-spread popular degeneracy. It only needed the culmination of rowdyism and crime in the fate of Walsh, and in the tragedy of Sickles, to intensify and give practical efficiency to the growing sentiment of outraged popular virtue and self-respect, and reverence for law. The tide has turned at length.

Have you noted the progress of the movement for the better observance of the Lord's day in this city? With a quietness almost like that it would bring over a wearied metropolis week by week, it has had a power almost as ubiquitous. Every journal feels it; police authorities recognise and rejoice in it; magistrates cannot ignore it. Sabbath-breakers, in every form, are conscious of a new restraint. Every dram-seller is troubled by it. Tens of thousands of householders are grateful for it. How is this? Why a handful of good men have grappled with the parent evils of our city, with a prudence that does not blunder, and a zealousness that knows no fear. And they have inspired the whole decent community with confidence and hope, while they have struck terror into the hearts of evil-doers. They have had the good sense to make sharply defined issues, which leave no alternative with opponents but to side with rebels and outlaws.

Thus, they struck at Sunday news-crying; with a few exceptions, where Subterranean magistrates take pleasure in thwarting the police, the nuisance is abated. They have laid bare the enormities of Sunday liquor-traffic; and already seven thousand complaints are in hands that dare not pocket them, as twenty-six thousand complaints have been pocketed in the District Attorney's office. It is said that other efficient measures are in progress, so that the problem hastens to a solution, whether law or ruin shall rule. Some timid men predict revolution if the restored supremacy of law is attempted. Be it so, is the answer of every patriot. Better, infinitely better, the looming on of the tempest now—if come it must—than when continued, unchecked degeneracy shall leave nothing but cinders! But an evil conscience is an element of weakness—"The wicked flee when no man pursueth." It needs nothing more than a bold, manly resistance even to the lawless, self-confident hordes, entrenched in selfishness and irreligion, and they will succumb to law, and right, and public sentiment.

So, when your readers turn a thought in the direction of men and morals in New York, let them comfort themselves with the hope that our Subterranean depths have a bottom, possibly a cover. Redeeming influences are abroad, and a great many of them. As of old, the Sabbath is a "sign between me and them;" and its restored sanctity will carry with it vast moral changes, affecting individual, social, and political life and destiny. Is there as much prayer as there ought to be for the men and morals of this city?

LITERARY NOTICES.

Mr. Colman, the agent, has laid on our table Vol. V. of this work. It begins with Chartreuse and ends with Cougar. Less important articles in this Cyclopedia are written by the page; the most elaborate, those upon leading subjects, are written to order by men of the best talent. Special themes are discussed by men especially familiar with them, and most competent to a thorough exposition; the articles are subjected to the careful supervision of the editors. Mr. Everett furnishes the article on "Lord Clarendon;" Mr. Hilliard the article on "Rufus Choate;" Mr. Seward the article on "De Witt Clinton;" "Congregationalism" is furnished by Rev. Mr. Gilman, of Bangor; and "Christianity is discussed by Dr. Sears, of Brown University; Mr. E. D. Mansfield furnishes "Cincinnati," "Cleveland," and "Columbus; Mr. Richard Hildreth writes of "Cuvier," and the "Coolies." To the five volumes now published, more than 160 writers are specially named as contributors. The series will hardly be completed within the limits originally promised or suggested, but none will grudge the additional volumes, since the work is done to such general satisfaction. The Cyclopedia is a success. It has passed the period of doubt, and has a paying circulation of over 12,000 copies of each volume.

Three Visits to Madagascar. By Rev. William Ellis; New York. Harper & Brothers.

An octavo volume of more than 500 pages, giving an account of the visits in 1853, 1854, and 1856, of a clergyman the London Missionary Society sent to examine in the truth of the reports, that the present Queen of Madagascar was inclined to favor Christianity and foreign trade.

The English made a treaty in 1817 with the King of Madagascar. Missionaries of the London Society went to the island in 1818, and in 1820 were admitted to the capital. They taught native schools, made converts, and trained many to the arts of peace, and to a life superior to that which they had led. The king died; the successor was assassinated, and the queen came into power. Cruel and superstitious priests and diviners of idol faith had full power over her. In 1835 Christianity was prohibited, and the missionaries left the island. Then followed years of trial and persecution to the feeble remnant that remained behind. Then, in 1845, fighting with English and French frigates, resulting in a total embargo of trade and communication for eight years. In 1846 the Queen's son was baptized by some of the Christian natives left behind, and has ever shown himself friend, protector, and advocate of the Christians. Reports of more temperate counsels and more moderate measures on the part of Madagascar reaching the adjacent islands, and then sent to England, induced the mission of Mr. Ellis. Though unsuccessful in some respects, his tour satisfied him of the existence of Christians in Madagascar, and gave him strong hopes that ere many years, and very certainly if the crown prince should come to the throne, the island will be opened to trade; and that its people, under a more benign sway, will at once move forward in a new path to influence and prosperity. This volume is illustrated after photographs. It is full of valuable information in regard to the people, climate, productions, government, manners and customs, and gives a clear and interesting view of one of the most important islands of the sea, (an island larger than the combined British isles) and occupied by a large and active population. Mr. Ellis has presented his statements in pleasant style, and with evident regard to truth and accuracy. For sale by H. D. McGinnis.

The American Garden. By Alexander Watson. New York; Harper & Brothers.

A good manual for the home garden. It is not too minute, technical, or comprehensive. It has information in regard to the garden, with its flowers and vegetables, and the court-yard or plantation, with its trees, fruits and shrubbery, without unnecessary chapters upon agriculture, the rearing of animals, and the management of a large estate. It is a copiously illustrated volume, with chapters on the form of a garden, preparation of soils, buildings, tools, manures, sowing and planting, insects, vegetables, with full descriptions of varieties, methods of raising, &c., fruits and fruit trees, grafting, budding, diseases of fruit trees, methods of culture, flowers and shrubs, green-houses, and brief notes upon farms and farm crops. This book will meet the wants of that large class, with small gardens, who have despaired in presence of ponderous and scientific treatises. For sale by H. D. McGinnis.

BISHOP ANDREW ON MISSIONS.

In a letter to the North Carolina Christian Advocate, in which he congratulates that Conference upon its successful movement to send a missionary to China; and in which he justly gives credit to this paper for having suggested the importance of allowing Conferences, Churches, or individuals to have "special missionary objects," accordingly to their convictions and sympathies, Bishop Andrew says: "Both preachers and people must have a fresh, a full, and hurailag baptism from God, before we shall commence in good earnest the work of evangelizing the world. We must get clear of our all-controlling desire to be rich and have our children rich. I am persuaded that the Church must speak another language on this subject. We must be willing to be poor, if God so direct. We must learn that there is a higher and holier use for money, than to hoard it for our children. We must be diligent and skilful in business; but in accumulating, as well as in expending, we must feel that we are working for the glory of God.

"But we not only want money, we must have also your sons and your daughters, to be laid on this altar. Here is work for your godly fathers, and your pious Hannahs. And for what are your Church institutions of learning established, if they do nothing to help on this great work? Your halls of learning ought, every one of them, to be grand missionary institutions, where your young men and your maidens shall be led to consecrate themselves to God, for any work or service He may appoint. You have labored and spent your money to but little purpose, in endowing and rearing up seminaries of learning, if they are to be simply used to train young minds and hearts for this world alone. No! no! I know this was not your grand object in view. Now let all your teachers renew the consecration of themselves and their work to God. Let every school under your charge become an efficient missionary seminary; then shall the glory of God crown our Conference."

WASHINGTON CITY CHURCH.

On our first page will be found a paper on this subject, from the pen of Rev. John C. Granbery, our pastor there. He is earnestly seconding the efforts of Mr. W. T. Smithson, who is to devote the proceeds of his book of sermons, "The Methodist Pupil, South," and of the "Great Picture" of the Bishops and General Conference, to this object. Our Church in Washington is a grand "representative" enterprise, and it should be equal, in architectural beauty and magnificence, to its representative character—that is, equal to any thing of the kind in the Union. Let not our friends, after so much publicity of effort, build an inferior Church. It will be a disappointment to every visitor, which would be fatal to its usefulness. Pay no attention to the ill-natured cavillings of those who fear that Methodists will honor God with a fine Church. Our Presbyterian brethren are also building a Church at Washington. Their members are liberal toward it. One man recently gave $25,000, and others are giving a thousand each. What is Virginia doing for ours? There is inquiry on this point, and it should be answered.

SOCIETIES AND THE CHURCH.

The American Tract Society, and the American Sunday-school Union, the Independent thinks, should be united, as they require two expensive organizations to do the same work. The worst objection to them, and to all similar Societies is, that they tend to swallow up the Church, for which Christ died. How can any one whom the Holy Ghost hath made an overseer over Christ's flock, assist in despoiling it, by fattening these irresponsible human associations? So pious is the aspect they present, and so plausible their fair speeches, that it seems hard and ungracious to oppose them.

But sound principles are better than popular pretensions. The Church will awake, at length, to the unscriptural basis, and disorganizing tendencies of these concerns.

Already do some of their Agents begin to chime in with that cry, which started in Rome, which "was taken up by infidels and latitudinarians generally, and which is to-day the strong-hold of opposition to Church Schools, Church periodicals, and Church literature—namely—"no Sectarianism"—"away with creeds"—"down with the isms"—"ecclesiastical bigotry"—"priestly pretension," etc. Opposition to them is attributed to sectarianism—that is, to exclusive and selfish devotion to one's own Church.

This is a misrepresentation, willful or otherwise—it matters not which. It is in behalf of the general Church, composed of all evangelical branches, that the opponents of these usurping organizations contend. They may be misunderstood, misrepresented, maligned, for a time; but they will receive the thanks of all the true friends of the development, progress, and power of the Kingdom of Christ, after awhile. Infidels argue against Christianity, appealing to admitted facts and premises, of which they would have known nothing, had it not been for the revelations of Christianity: Latitudinarians contend for the practicability, outside of the Church, of a piety and salvation, of which they never would have heard, had it not been for the Church: And these societies, outside of the Church, and in opposition to her legitimate operations, speculate upon, and, like foreign itinerant hucksters, peddle to supply the religious wants which have been awakened by the influence of the institutions and labors of the Church.

METHODISM IN NEW ORLEANS.

A sprightly and intelligent correspondent of the Pittsburg Christian Advocate says: "Methodism in New Orleans has always labored under disadvantages; but within a few years an improvement has taken place. It is unnecessary to recount the difficulties, more than to say, that "after a long time" the good seed took effect, and fruit began to appear. Small unpretending Church edifices were erected, and these in their turn have been superseded by beautiful and costly structures; so that Methodism no longer is a mere name, but a power in this modern Sodom. Several years ago the interests of the Church required the establishment of a paper, which gave birth to the New Orleans Christian Advocate; and Dr. M'Tyeire was appointed the editor. Under his able editorial supervision the paper steadily grew in favor; and since his transfer to the Parent Advocate, in Nashville, last Summer, the paper, under the direction of the present editor, is still rising in favor and increasing in circulation. Without detracting in the least from the former editor, it is proper to say that if sprightly and timely editorials, tact in preparing departments, and labor bestowed, are requisite to make a popular, influential, and widely circulated journal, then brother Gillespie is entitled to this much, and more still. But leaving this, we note another important step. Nearly two years ago—perhaps three—the Advocate office was removed several squares higher up Camp street, and simultaneous with this movement a Book Depository was opened, under the agency of M'Tyeire and Keener. Not content with this, the question was soon after mooted, "Why not buy this house and lot, or one equally as eligibly located?" The question was not long discussed among the ministerial brethren until several enterprising laymen got wind of the matter, and, we are happy to say, the purchase was consummated last year. The building is four stories, and located on one of the finest business streets in the city, and is admirably adapted to the purpose, having ample accommodations for book-room, editorial and business offices, mailing and composition rooms. Lafayette Square is near, on that street, with such costly building improvements for neighbors as Odd Fellows' Hall, City Hall, and First Presbyterian Church—all within a stone throw of the structure."

TEN THOUSAND THIS YEAR.

One of our Preachers writes: "Whenever I visit a family, and do not find the Advocate there, I immediately impress it upon them to send for it. Most of the subscribers I have sent you, are people who never had a paper. They are all highly pleased with the Advocate. It is doing much good. May it spread far and wide, until every family shall have a copy."

The word "immediately," in the above, impresses us. What a grand tract distribution is the circulation of the Advocate! Better than any thing else of the sort; for it has religion, and news, and general reading, and every thing else in it; and then it comes every week, and is so cheap. A society to circulate the Advocate, is the true tract society. Let us have it in ten thousand families by the close of this year. Ten new subscribers from each traveling preacher, three from each local preacher, two from each steward and class-leader, and one from each of our present subscribers, will more than do the work. Many are responding—some have already gone far over their apportionment. All we need is, that all should respond. Be quick—the year is passing away.

An East Alabama Preacher writes: "Your paper is growing in the confidence of the people. I hope to do much for it this year."

A Preacher writing from Tallapoosa county, Ala., says: "The paper is quite popular up here."

A Preacher from North-Western Louisiana says: "The patrons of the paper are well pleased with the manner in which it is conducted. Receive our best wishes for your success."

A young lady in Mississippi writes: "I do not know of a paper any where that could exert a better influence. May the members of our Church strive to give it greater circulation. I hope to have the pleasure, in a few weeks, of sending several new subscribers."

A young lady in Kentucky writes that she is always charmed with the reading of the Advocate, published, as it is, in the Sunny South, where she used to live.

JOHN TEHOOMBER TALBOT.

Bishop Early has on foot a plan for the education of pious and promising Indian youths, of the different tribes under our care. He now has one in charge, named John Tehoomber Talbot, after Rev. N. M. Talbot, who speaks English pretty well, prays well, speaks in class meetings, and love feasts, reads, writes, and is making some progress in grammar and arithmetic, and thinks it is his duty to preach the gospel.

The Bishop is himself, and has others, on the look-out for similar cases, and appeals for help in the way of funds to carry out the plan. It is certainly a good one. The pious and lamented Dixon W. Lewis is an instance illustrative of it.

A Writer in the True Witness says: "We say, and that unhesitatingly, but with shame, that the outward public desecration of the Sabbath may be attributed to the Church, her indifference and want of effort!" So, then, there is in New Orleans no difficulty, outside of the Church, to overcome in order to make this a most exemplary Sabbath-keeping city. Nonsense, and worse!

CHRISTIAN SETTLEMENTS OF BUSINESS DISPUTES.

The Scriptures expressly condemn "brother going to law with brother," and the Methodist Discipline, Scriptural warrant, provides for the settlement of business disputes by a committee of brethren, without going to law. Unworthy members of the Church go to law with brethren, however, in violation of the Scriptures which they vowed obediently to obey, of their Church law which is founded upon this, too, when the commercial world is beginning practically to acknowledge the wisdom of the Church method.

The Courier and Inquirer states what probably is generally known, that there is in New York a court of appeals, where judges do not sit nor lawyers argue, but nevertheless works well. This is the arbitration committee of the Corn Exchange. It is the general court of merchants involved in any difference growing out of business at the Exchange, to refer it to the committee, binding themselves to abide its decision, without delay or appeal. The result is, that hundreds of cases which would have consumed years to litigate, and cost hundreds or thousands of dollars, have been amicably settled on the spot. This tribunal has been five years in operation, and has been found to work satisfactorily, and from its example followed elsewhere, parties might cheaply in twenty-four hours decisions that they pay dear for, and are lucky if they obtain within twenty-four months.

And there are men, both in the ministry and laity, who would not be there, had their business disputes been before the Church, instead of before the Courts.

THE THREE YEAR RULE.

The Christian Advocate and Journal favors the extension of the time of the itinerant pastorate from two to three years, and thinks it will be adopted by the General Conference. He says Mr. Wesley first had two, but afterwards three years, which has become settled practice in England and Canada. He also says that if it does not work well, it can be changed by the General Conference after. The editor says: "All definite appointments wished by some will certainly be conceded, and would be extremely perilous to superior preachers would soon be immovably fixed in the best Churches; the appointing power would be practically, if not theoretically, helpless; and the combined will of these Churches and pastors in the itinerancy would fall in our most influential Churches, and, by their example, would soon fall everywhere. Methodism be thus shorn of its greatest excellence and energy. Foster, the president of Chesbunt College, the (Lady Huntingdon "Connection,") attributes the failure of Calvinistic Methodism, in England, largely to the fact that itinerancy early ceased, and the Churches through the control of their pulpits by boards of trustees, rather than by the whole Conference with American Methodism.

REV. DR. WIGHTMAN.

At the recent commencement of the Charleston College, N. R. Middleton, LL D., the President of the College, announced that the degree of LL. D., had been conferred on the Rev. W. M. Wightman, D D. The Courier, in making this announcement, says: "The gentleman's name is second on the long list of names of this Institution. Many of these occupy distinguished positions in the several professions, but none of them have reflected greater glory on their Alma Mater than this divine and scholar. It was fitting that the highest honor should be conferred by her. It is an evidence of her appreciation of his abilities, and of all the labors she takes in his splendid success. It is seldom that an Institution of learning has an opportunity of crowning with her highest honors one in every respect so worthy. Some of the truest and most useful men of the church to which this gentleman belongs, graduated at this college."

The Effects of the "Montara" Case.—The Paris correspondent writes: "People who are like to know something of the personal feelings of the Pope do not hesitate to say (and the marked alliance of the Canon Law,' as inapplicable to modern society, dont the ease) that the treatment of the Mortara case of Bologna by Rome was the last feather that broke the back of the present system in the Papal States, and, as all its abuses are, by Austria. The human mind could stand it no longer; and if French troops are to be mere policemen at Rome, aiding and abetting these monstrous doings, the disgrace and infamy are intolerable. The boy Mortara has done it all."

Peace Congress.—Peace at length begins to dawn upon Europe. The steamship Canada, which arrived a few days since, brings intelligence that Austria, Great Britain, France, Russia and Prussia have consented to hold a Congress, as proposed by Russia, for the amicable adjustment of the Italian question. The Congress will meet probably at Aix-La-Chapelle. It was also said that Sardinia and the other Italian States would be represented in the Congress. The British Plenipotentiary to the Congress, it is reported, would be Lord Malmesbury, and Prince Napoleon would represent France. We never believe they would fight.

Open Communion doctrines are giving trouble to the Baptist brethren in Boston. Mr. Howell, a candidate for the ministry, when asking ordination, declared he would admit any one to the communion who believed he was baptized. He would have been ordained, but he said no more; but he afterwards said he would admit any Christian, baptized or not—and was refused ordination. The refusal was just—we hope they will ordain him. If a man is a Baptist, let him be one with us—and so of all other denominations. His first position suits us, but it is not Baptist doctrine.

Sleeping Cars have "gone into operation." We thought they would. Rev. Samuel Watson, of the Memphis Advocate, who has recently slept the route from Pittsburg to Philadelphia, says that when the train comes on, and the sleeping preparations become necessary, almost by the magic wand of the master of ceremonies each pair of seats is transformed into comfortable berths, one above another, for five persons. Thus the car will hold some twelve or fifteen more persons by lying down than sitting up. We get a comfortable night's rest, and thank the inventor.

A New Telegraph to Mobile, we are glad to see, connects this city with all the Lake watering-places, to great convenience.—The cable was laid, on land, from Mobile to Pascagoula; submerged across Pascagoula Bay; on land to Ocean Springs; submerged to Biloxi; on land to Mississippi City and Pass Christian; submerged across Bay St. Louis to the village of that name; thence by land to Pearl river; submerged to Fort Pike; and thence to New Orleans by land.

A Daughter of Bishop George.—At the first session of the Philadelphia Conference of the M. E. Church, the committee in the case of Mrs. Frazer, daughter of the late Bishop George, reported that she is a widow in utterly destitute circumstances, with four children dependent upon her, and earnestly commend her to the Christian charity of the Conference, and the public within its bounds.

The Paraguary Difficulties is settled, President Lopez having yielded, and promised to accede to the demands of our government, and the small ships of the expedition are to be sent to settle up the affairs of Paraguay.

FOREIGN.

Lots and Interesting from Mexico.

The steamship Quaker City, which arrived here yesterday, touched at Vera Cruz on the 1st instant to land Mr. McLane, the American Minister to Mexico. Her purser kindly furnishes us with the following news from that country: On the 16th ult. General Miramon appeared before Vera Cruz with an advance guard af 300 men, apparently for the purpose of reconnoitering the defenses of the city. The main body of the army being encamped at Medellne, about nine miles distant. Considerable alarm was felt in the city by the citizens, and women and children were at once transferred to the shipping and the foreign consulates, the American Consul giving protection to 150 persons. President Juhrez and his officers, however, awaited coming events with calmness and confidence.

It immediately became evident to Gen. Miramon that Vera Cruz was in a much better condition for defense than he for an attack, his army having been very much weakened by desertions, and demoralized by the want of pay and provisions, while on the other hand, the Liberal forces were every day growing more determined and hopeful.

An experienced eye-witnes informs us that he never saw troops more animated, submitting without murmur to almost an entire absence of provistons, and sleeping in the open plaza undererms, without tents, and almost without clothes.

It is reported that Gen. Miramon had confidently expected that his appearance would cause an immediate surrender of the city. Disappointed in this, he dispatched an expedition against Alvarado of 1200 men, under Col. Casa Novn—the entire cavalry of his army. Its coming, howeve, was anticipated, and garrison fully prepared. Two gun-boats, also, which had been sent around from Vera Cruz opened upon the advance guard with long 68s, which so alarmed the gallant Colonel that he and his forces turned and fled ingloriously.

Here ended the long talked of expedition against Vera Criz. On the 27th ult., Gen. Miramon broke up his camp at Medellne, and with his forces much lncensed and in a state of insubordination, retreated toward Mexico, for the purpose (as he said) of chastising the rebels near the Capital.

In the meanwhile, Generals Ampudia and Traconi, of the Liberal forces, are said to have fortified themselves in his rear, and competent judges confidently express the opinion that he will never reach Mexico; on the contrary, they expect that the next mail from the Capital will bring the intelligence of its surrender, as, by the last newe, General Degollado had advanced to Tacubaya with 4000 men, and the city was otherwise nearly surrounded by the Liberal forces.

The first of April was a day of general rejoicing in Vera Cruz. The troops were relieved from duty, and official invitations were published for families to return to their homes. The gates of the city were thrawn open; the market supplied with provisions fram the surrounding country, and all the citizens were in a high state of glee. At this oppurtune moment, Mr. McLane, our Minister, lauded at Vera Cruz, under a salute from a Mexican battery and the U. S. ship-of-war Savannah. He was received on the Mole and cordially greeted by the city authorities.

SIX DAYS LATER FROM MEXICO.

Jaurez Government Recognized by the American Minister.

Battle at the City of Mexico.

Southwest Pass, April 11.—The steamship Tennessee, from Vera Cruz, crossed the bar at 10 o'clock last night.

She left Vera Cruz on the 6th inst., and brings one days later newa fram that port and fifteen days later news from the City of Mexico.

Vera Cruz, April 0.—The Government of Jaurez was recognized to-day by the American Minister, Mr. McLane, as the Government of the Republic of Mexico. The announcement of this long-hoped for event was the signal for the most enthusiastic rejoicing among the natives as well as among the foreign population.

A national salute was fired. A grand military parade was ordered, which marched through the streets amid the ringing of all the bells of the city and shouts of the people.

Advices fram the city of Mexico to the 4th inst., had reached Vera Cruz by special express, which represent that on the 2d inst. General Degollado made a vigorous attack upon the capital, with the determiaation of capturing it.

A severe engagement followed, the city being resolutely defended from behind breastworks and barricades.

After a long and severe struggle, Degollado, finding his ranks being thinned rapidly fram his exposed position, and the security of the garrison behind fortifications, was obliged to retire, being unsuccessful.

It is stated that five hundred men were killed on each side—(a rather doubtful statement.)

Gen. Mimmon had succeeded in reaching Orizaba in his retreat from Vera Cruz, his ranks being much thinned ont by desertion.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

Arrival of the City of Baltimore.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE PEACE CONGRESS.

New York, April 12.—The steamship City of Baltimore, Captain Leitch, arrived this morning, with four daye later advices than were received from Halifax by the Canada.

Liverpool Cotton Market—March 30.

The sales of Cotton for the three business days since the calling of the Canada, amount to 28,000 bales; of which speculators took 5000 and exporters 4000 bales. The market opened firm, and closed quiet and dull. Quotations are generally unchanged: Middling Orleans, 7¾; Middling Uplands, 7 1-6 to 7¼.

Political and General Intelligence.

Liverpool, March 30.—The political news by the City of Baltimore is confirmatory of previous advices respecting the state of affairs on the Continent, the pacific tendencies of the contending powers, and the preparations going forward for the assembling of a Congress of the great powers, for the consideration of the Italian question, and the preservation of the peace of Europe.

It is now expected that the Congress will meet at Baden between the 15th and 20th of April.

A representative of Piedmont will probably be admitted to the Congress, but it is considered doubtful whether its representative will be allowed a vote in the proceedings.

The belligerent powers, France, Austria, and Sardinia, still continue their armaments.

The Reform Bill in England.

The debate on the Ministerial Reform Bill was still progressing in the British Parliament, and the Government has staked the existence of the Cabinet upon the issue.

Important from the West Indies.

New York, April 0.—By an arrival at this port we have received advices fram San Domingo to the 15th of March, which announces that hostilities had commenced between San Domingo and Denmark, growing out of the recent seizure of Danish vessels by the Revolutionary party.

Intrigues of the French.—Private letters from San Domingo say that previous to the action of the Danish envoy, the French Consul General made a formal demand on the Dominican government for the surrender of all the gold, copper and coal mines of that itepublic into the hands of the French government.

The Cuban Invasion.

New York, April 0.—The New York Courier des Etats Unis of this morning, reiterates its assertion that an extensive organization exists which is preparing for the luvasion of Cuba, and that a part of the expedition has already sailed for the Cuban coast.

DOMESTIC.

California.

Later from California.—By the arrival of the steamship Quaker City from Manatitlan, we have received San Francisco papers of the 21st ult.—two weeks later than previous advices.

The receipts of Dust, saye the Bulletin, from the mines are backward for the season. The condition of the roade is alleged as the occasion of the delay, as it is well established that the miners are working with every advantage. Remittances have, however, come forward quite freely within the past few days, and we shall look to see a considerable improvement in this respect as the season progresses.

Final adjournment of the Legislature.—The Senate has concurred in the amendment by the Assembly, fixing the final adjournment of the Legislatura on the 18th of next month.

Indian women, says the Mariposa Gazette, have been marriedto white men, in numerous instances, in Fresno county. They are said to make excellent wives, and neat and tidy and industrious, and soon learn to discharge domestic duties properly and creditably.

The Anti-Chinese Crusade in Shasta County.—The whiten engeged in the leto anti-Chinese crusade near Shasta, were tried and acquitted in that town on the evenlag of 5th of March. The Sheriff discharged all his posse except twelve, whom he retained to go to Red Bluffs to receive and guard the State arms forwarded by the governor.

The Camels at Los Angeles.—Some of the United States Camels had been in Los Angeles, and set all the inhabitants agog. They were very quiet and tractable, walking off briskly with the heaviest loads. Some of them can carry 2000 lbs., but they were not loaded with more than from 000 to 1000 lbs.

Returned from Fraser.—Gen. Palmer (farmerly Indian Superintendent of Oregon) has returned fram his long Fraser river tour. We understand the General brought with him about four hundred ounces of Fraser river dust, and that he reports that gold is abundant in the Fraser and Thompsan river country.

Han. W. Hawks, late State Senator and e son of Rev. Dr. Hawks, of New York, died in San Francisco on the 14th ult.

Cotton at Southern Ports.

Augusta, Ga., April 6.—The Total Receipts of Cotton.—According to the price current table of the Augusta Constitutionalist of this morning, the receipts of Cotton at all Southern ports amount to 3,340,000 bales.

The receipts at the interior towns, including Augusta, Macon, Americus, Columbus, Albany, Montgomery, Selma, Memphis, Houston, amount to 143,620 bales, making the total receipts since the 1st of September, 3,483,620 bales.

Nicaragua.

Washington, April 6.—Gen. Lamar's Instructions.—The dispatches sent out by Mr. Runnells, to our Nicaragua Minister, instruct Gen. Lamar to positively insist upon an apology and to require full restitution and ample indemnity for the recent acts of the Nicaragua Government in relation to the seizure and confiscation of the property of American citizens. In case the Nicaraguan Government refuse to accede to these just demands, Gen. Lamar is instructed to demand his passports, and call the Gulf and Pacific squadrons, which have been placed under his orders, to aid him in the protection of the rights and property of our citizens.

The River.

Vicksburg, April 11.—Two More Crevasses.—The river at this point has been about stationary since Saturday. A break in the levee occurred at Hood's place on the Mississippi side, opposite Point Pleasant, on Saturday evening. Last night the levee opposite Warrenton, at Bedford's place, broke through, and the river is now fulling fram the effect of the large quantity of water which is pouring through the crevasses.

LOCAL.

Steam Fire Engines—which have been foolishly opposed heretofore, have grown greatly in popularity, since our late disastrous fires. They will, and ought to become an established "institution." It is hoped that in this city, and in all our large cities, they will supercede, to a great extent, the hand engines.

Westward Ho!

The New Orleans and Houston Railroad.—Col. A. M. Gentry, President of the Houston and Sabine Railroad Company of whose successful negotation in London for the iran for the whole of the road fram Houston to the Sabine, we made mention a few days ago, and who visited Baton Rouge for the purpose of securing a charter to extend the road from the Sabine to meet the Opelousas road at New Iberia, got all he desired. Our Houston friends have manifested in this effort, much energy and perseverance; and we trust now that the ball has been put fairly in motion, that our own citizens will come up manfully to the support of the work. It is computed, says the Houston Telegraph, that the road will not cost over $20,000 per mile, if so much as that, and the business that it will do, will make it undoubtedly one of the best paying roads in the country.

We learn from the Houston Telegraph that the work upon the railroads connecting that place with other portions of the great State is progressing favorably, and as the crops this far promise to be abundant, the planters will have the means to push it on with greater energy than ever. The Houston Tap and Brazoria Road is completed about twenty miles, which brings it near the rich plantations of Brazoria county. The first arrival of cotton from that county in Houston occurred on Saturday week, and amounted to 174 bales. The work on the road is going on rapidly. The Buffalo Bayou Brazos and Colorado road is completed to the San Bernard fifty miles, and the bridge across that stream in progress of construction. Fifteen miles further are graded and the iron ready to be laid. The Central Road is doing a fine business now, and the contractors are pushing it on with a heavy force. It will penetrate the great wheat region of Texas. The Washington county road, leeding towards Austin, the capital of the State, reaches nearly to the Brazos river. In all, there are now open in connection with Houston 173 miles of railroad done, and the prospect of a large increase within a couple of years. All these roads will pour their united business into Houston, and fram thence via the Houston and New Orleans Railroad when it shall be completed—the whole distance from Houston to the Sabine, 160 miles, being under contract, the whole of the iron provided for and a part of it afloat—into New Orleans. Hence, the great importance of this road to the business of this city and the interest that it ought in consequence to excite among us.

One among the many advantages which the completion of this work will bring us will be the improvements which our ment markets will receive. It is well known that a large portion of our supplies come fram Texas, and of course by steamers. During the hot weather the health of the animals is more or less effected by being crowded together on the hull of a steamboat. Frequently they become diseased and die on the passage. When the railraad is built they can reach our markets in twelve hours from their places. A heavy sum will be saved in freight, and our markets will in consequence be not only better supplied, but supplied on better terms to our people. [Bulletin.

In Flames.

Another Great Fire.—About $350,000 Worth of Property Destroyed.—A fire that has destroyed more property than any other hint one, that has, we believe, ever occurred in New Orleans, took place yesterday in and araund the neighborhood of the Lower Cotton Press. The loss cannot be less than $350,000, almost all of which, so far as we can learn, will have to be borne by the Insurance Companies, whom we are glad to say, are amply able to meet the loss, divided as it is among the various offices.

The fire broke out in the cotton pickery establishment of Chase & Lay, on Grentman street, between Montegut and Clouet streets, Third District. It soon spread to the pickery of Patrick O'Brien, on the opposite side of the street, and then the flames extended on every side for three or four squares.

There was no water!! And to this cause alone, fram the most reliable information we could obtain, must be ascribed the destruction of property 12,000 bales of cotton and fifty or fifty one-story and two-story dwelling houses. A large number—some two or three hundred—of persons were deprived of homes by the destructive conflagration. Most of the houses were occupied by laborers and mechanics.

Three of the yards of the Lower Cotton Press were entirely destroyed, and a fourth one was nearly consumed.

We found it impossible to obtain further particulars for this morning's paper than we give below. The owners of the houses and property destroyed were so numerous that we were unable to obtain a precise statement of their names and losses. The factors who had cotton stored there, were Messrs. Duncan & Logun, J. F. Wiche & Co., B. M. Lowe & Co., Watt & Noble, J. C. Ricks & Co., Brander, Humbard & Co., Hewitt, Norton & Co., and A. Miltenberger & Barron, and a large number of bales that were stored to order. [Bulletin.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Republica are Ungrateful.

History of the Washington Monument.—On the 24th of December, 1799, the Congress of the United States passed the following, among other resolutions:

Resolved, That a marble monument be erected by the United States, in the Capitol, at the city of Washington, and that the family of General Washington be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it; and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct a copy of these resolutions to be transmitted to Mrs. Washington, assuring her of the profound respect Congress will ever bear to her person and character: of their condolence on the late afflicting dispensation of providence; and entreating her assent to the interment of the remains of General George Washington in the manner expressed in the first resolution.

Mr. Adams, then President of the United States, transmitted these resolutions to Mrs. Washington, who, on the 31st December 1799, returned the following answer:

Mount Vernon, December 31, 1799.

"Sir: While I feel with keenest anguish the late dispensation of Divine Providence, I cannot be insensible to the mournful tributes of respect and veneration which are paid to the memory of my dear deceased husband; and as his best services and most anxious wishes were always devoted to the welfare and happiness of his country, to know that they were truly appreciated and gratefully remembered affords me no inconsiderable consolation.

"Taught by that great example which I have so long had before me, never to oppose my private wishes to the public will, I must consent to the request made by Congress, which you have had the goodness to transmit me; and in doing this I need not, I cannot say, what a sacrifice of individual feeling I make to a sense of public duty.

With grateful acknowledgments and unfeigned thanks for the personal respect and evidences of condolence expressed by Congress and yourself,

"I remain, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient humble servant, Martha Washington."

In January, 1824, Mr. Buchanan, then a member of Congress, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed whose duty it shall be to inquire into what manner the resolutions of Congress, passed on the 24th of December, 1799, relative to the erection of a marble maanment in the Capitol at the city of Washington, to commemorate the great events of the military and political life of General Washington, may be best accomplished, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

This was laid on the table, by a vote of 97 to 87. It was in 1834, ten years latar, that the present Washington Monument Society was formed; and last week, under the new organization of that society, Mr. Buchanan being its President, he made a speech, praiawlng the history of the monument, and referring to his speech in Congress in 1824. It is probable that the Monument Association, which seems to have received a new impulse, will proceed to complete the undertaking they have so long had in hand. In 1824, Mr. Buchanan thought that "Congress, by neglecting for so long a period to accomplish the object of the resolution, had been subjected to the imputation of perfidy as well as ingratitude. We made (he said) a solemn promise to the widowed partner of Washington, and to the people of the United States, by a legislative act, that we would erect a monument to his memory."

The Trans-Atlantic Balloon.

Mr. John LaMountain, the Aeronaut, has nearly completed the arrangements for constructing a mammoth balloon, with which he hopes and believes he will be able to cross the Atlantic. Its construction will be commenced by him a short distance from this city, in a few days, and pushed forward, so that the aerial ship will be ready to try the experiment of reaching England during the early part of the present season. In size the balloon will be far ahead of anything, of the kind heretofore constructed. It will be about 75 feet long and 05 in dimeter, holding about 140,000 cubic feet of gas. The largest balloon thus far has only been of the capacity of 75,000 feet.

Nearly all the materials of Mr. LaMountain's balloon have been purchased, and have been selected with regard to lightness combined with strength. The Troy Patent Rope Works are now engaged in manufacturing the rope, of which there will be about five miles required. Four miles of this will be quite small in size, about three thirty-seconds of an inch diameter. The rest will be somewhat larger. This rope is prepared with great care, and is of immense strength. The best material is used, spun in boiling water, by which it is kept firm and free fram kinks. The silk and other articles used by Mr. LaMountain will be prepared with equal attention, and as far as man can foresee no autoward break can possibly mar the success of the experiment.

The balloon will have a large car attached to it, which will contain a small life boat now building at New York and nearly ready. The life boat will be 16 feet in length, and will weigh but 125 pounds—thus adapting it in every respect to the purpose for which it is intended. It will be a strang, handsome, and—in case of necessity—a safe craft. The car will also contain a steam-engine, attached to a propelling apparatus of Mr. LaMountain's own devising, by means of which the balloon can be raised or lowered from current to current at a moment's notice. In ordinary balloons this is effected by sufferiug gas to escape, or throwing out ballast. A contrivance similar to the propeller is a great improvement in this respect, and upon a long voyage across the Atlantic would be indispensable. It will have a lifting power of four tons, and as the boiler will be heated by alcohol, there will be no danger of of explosion. The total weight of engine, boiler and propeller, will be less than 450 lbs.

As soon as the balloon is completed, we believe it is intended by its owner to exhibit at Bond's Hall, and probably test its power by a flight across the continent, previous to embarking on no ocean voyage. Should it ever reach England—which Mr. LaMountain and his friends are sanguine it will—we can well imagine our John Bull cousins will have no elevated notion of America and American "institutions." The appearance of the air-monster, traveling on the wings of the wind, but under the control of one man, would indeed be a sight worthy to be remembered for a life-time. [Troy Whig.]

OUR OWN BOOKS.

Wheeever we see a good thing we like to circulate it, to-wit:—

"Mind your Own Business, is an old injuction which cannot be too scrupulously observed. Especially would we urge it upon our Church in regard to our publishing interests. The time was when we had to depend upon others for our religious literature, not having a book or paper in the land that we could call our own. But our circumstances have changed; we now have an ample supply of weeklies, monthlies, and quarterlies, the largest list of general religious reading books and Sunday-school books printed in this (Southern) country, many of which have reached to an almost unparalleled circulation. Besides we have multiplied greatly in our numbers and wealth. Only let us purchase, read and circulate the issues of our own press first, and as largely as they deserve, and we shall extend our achievements beyond the highest expectations of the most believing ones among us. Scarcely a day passes which does not reveal some new success of our press. Let us be of good cheer thee, and push on in our "great work;" rejoicing always and heartily in the great good being done by others, but attending faithfully to tha peculiar work which God in his wise providence has assigned to us."

COMMERCIAL.

Tuesday Evening, April 12, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New-Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 0th inst.:

The week has passed without much activity in the general market, and considerable fluctuations in prices have been observable. In the early part of the week the Cotton market was dull and depressed, but later Enropean advices by the steamer New York, received here on Tuesday, gave an active impulse to the demand and restored firmness to prices. In Tobacco there has been rather more movement, but the transactions in Sugar and Molasses have been comparatively limited, and great dullness prevails in nearly all departments of the Western Produce market, with unsettled and depressed prices.

On Thursday evening the Indian's advices arrived, confirming the favorable accounts brought by the New York, the reported sales for three days, in the Liverpool Cotton market being 31,000 bales—the advance, as reported by the New York, is 1-16 to ⅛d, per pound. Middling Orleans being quoted at 7 5-1d to 7¾d. On Friday the Canada's advices (Liverpool 26th ult.) came to hand, reporting the week's business at 70,000 bales, the market closing firm, with an advance on all qualities during the week of ⅛d.

The river is but a few inches below high-water mark.

COTTON.—In our semi-weekly review we noticed great dullness and depression at the opening of the week, consequent upon the unfavorable Europenn advices brought by the Persia, which caused prices to give way ⅛c. per pound, which was recovered on Tuesday, under the influence of a very active demand, produced by the favorable advices brought by the New York, and which resulted in sales on that day of fully 21,000 bales. On Wednesday buyers again came forward quite freely, but, with a reduced supply immediately on sale and a less favorable assortment, the business fell off to about 10,500 bales. On Thursday the demand was renewed quite actively, and, with a somewhat better supply, sales were effected to the extent of about 16,000 bales. On Friday the Indian's advices, one day later, were before the public, fully confirming the favorable advices previously received from Europe. This intelligence tended to strengthen our market still more, and to encourage a continued good demand, which resulted in further sales of about 13,000 bales. Thus making a total for the past three days of 49,000 bales; and for the whole week of 71,500 bales; the receipts, during same period, 22,840; and the exports, 61,710 bales. Stock, in Presses and on ship-board, not cleared on the 8th inst. 372,374 bales. With respect to prices, we have already stated that a decline of ⅛c. had to be submitted to in the early part of the week, under a withdrawal of demand and a pressure of stock, but this decline was promptly recovered on receipt of the New York's advices, and, since then, with freights in their favor, the tendency has been in favor of sellers, resulting at the close in an advance of ⅛ to ⅛c. per pound. Holders manifest great confidence, and now generally claim rates still higher than our advanced quotations.

Centenary College of Louisiana.

TO THE PUBLIC.—The undersigned, a quorum of the Executive Committee of Centenary College of Louisiana, would state that the Rev. VERNON H. JOHNSON, a member of the Mississippi Conference, is our agent for the College—to raise funds for building and endowment purposes—and that we cordially commend him, and the cause he represents, to the friends of Education and the public generally.

The Board of Trustees, have recently erected a large building, for College purposes, at a cost of 60,000; upon which a heavy balance remains unpaid. They wish to pay this debt, and to raise the endowment fund to at least $100,000. They know that the friends of education are able to do this, and they believe they are willing, and only wait the opportunity. Under these considerations, our Agent has gone forth; and, from this present success, we feel confident that the work will be done speedily. Friends desiring to know our plan or to co-operate with us, can communicate with the Agent, Rev. V. N. Johnson, Cayuga Mississippi; or with John C. Miller, Jackson, La.

SKETCH OF METHODIST BIBLICAL INSTITUTES.

Contribution to the Methodist Historical Society.

In 1744, at the first Conference of Wesleyan Methodism, it was asked, "Can we have a seminary for laborers?" and the answer was, "If God spare us until another Conference." At the next Conference the question was asked again, and it was answered, "Not until God gives us a proper teacher."

Lady Huntingdon, in 1767, next consulted Mr. Wesley and other pious friends concerning a plan she had formed for educating preachers. Mr. Wesley heartily embraced it, for he had suggested nearly the same scheme at his two first Conferences. Fletcher, of Madeley, also approved of it; and the noble lady soon opened the college in a romantic and dilapidated castle in Trevecca, Wales. James Glasscock, a collier and quarry-man, was the first to enter this "school of the prophets." He afterwards became one of Mr. Wesley's preachers, and subsequently obtained ordination in the Established Church. He was distinguished for piety and usefulness. Fletcher was President of the college, and Joseph Benson its head master. Students flocked here. No test of religious opinions was required for admission. All who professed true conversion, with a determination to enter the ministry of the Established or Dissenting Churches were heartily welcomed.

Subsequent conferences entertained the design of a theological institution, which was at last completed by the two well-endowed schools for preachers in England. No institutions of English Methodism are more esteemed or liberally supported; they exert a powerful influence upon the operations and interests of the Wesleyans. Methodism and the great Reformation both commenced their glorious and pious work in universities; and our beloved Zion should ever zealously continue to promote useful religious knowledge with sound literary education. American Methodism has also successfully carried out these views of Mr. Wesley. The Biblical Institute at Concord has now been established some ten years, growing in size, popularity and usefulness. From its commencement the classes have regularly increased, until the present junior numbers not less than forty students, and the senior is said to be the largest theological one in our land. New England Methodists cherish this religious school, and have formed education societies, to assist young men in their studies for the sacred work of the ministry. For the same object public collections are made in many congregations.

The Biblical Institute at Evanston, near Chicago, is another successful school, and richly endowed by an "elect lady," a distinguished blessing to our land, as Lady Huntingdon was to Wesley's. Beautiful and striking coincidence! How worthy of imitation! This institution has an able faculty, is well patronized with students, and must be of great service, especially to the rising churches in our vast Western regions.

The New York Conferences have appointed a joint committee to consider the establishment of a Biblical institute within their region. We doubt not concerning their report; it will be favorable. Our emporium city is the place for this new "school of the prophets." Her libraries, eminent pulpit orators, press, commerce, churches, zeal, and liberality, and a thousand other aids, all confirm such a selection. In the mean while, the Middletown and Troy colleges should in some degree supply the want of this institution, which we are happy to know they are doing.

To Dr. Dempster's influence, zeal and perseverance, is the Methodist Church in this country more indebted for her Biblical schools than to any one else. By invitation from the California Conference, he is now corresponding with that body in relation to the establishment of a Biblical institute on the Pacific shores. This idea will grow, as it deserves, for the future and permanent success of Methodism in that gigantic new world. Her beautiful temples there should be built on the firmest foundations, and supplied with the ablest ministers, for the salvation of the myriads seeking fortunes or homes in those golden regions.

The Church is now fully awake to her responsibility in the subject of collegiate education, but toward the importance of Biblical schools she has slept too long. We are waking up, however; a brighter day is at hand, and the successful establishment of the Concord and Evanston Institutes is the dawn of this wished-for day.

The Church has ever been favored with Biblical schools. Very early those at Alexandria strongly resembled the institutions of our day. Eusebius states that they flourished more than two hundred years. Athenagoras, it is imagined, was the first theological professor, and to him succeeded Pantanus, about A. D. 181. Under him the Alexandrine school obtained a world-wide fame. Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen, distinguished for learning and theology, were his successors in office. Neander says, of this old Biblical school: "It was the birth-place of theology in its proper sense." Its studies were chiefly the Holy Scriptures in the Greek and Hebrew originals, emphatically a "school for the expounding of the Scriptures." The bold Wicklif was a Biblical professor at Oxford; and by translating the whole Bible into English, (1380) entailed upon England the richest legacy that Christian land ever inherited. Wicklif, Huss, and Jerome, at the University of Prague, gloriously suffered martyrdom because they instructed candidates for the Christian ministry, and circulated portions of God's word.

Then the truth was buried nearly a century, but blazed forth again never to go out, at the appearance of Luther and Melancthon, both Bible students in the University of Wirtemberg; and amid its cloisters the former became divinity professor, the latter Greek. Every day at one o'clock Luther lectured on the Bible. This was the first Biblical school of the blessed Reformation, and the two great reformers, its professors; afterward Calvin and Beza labored in the same good work at Geneva, and thousands of students, it is related, flocked here for religious instruction from these evangelical men. Dr. James Arminius was another divinity professor at that remarkable period; the great expounder, to use Wesley's words, of as "manly and rational a system of divinity as any age or nation has produced." To his doctrine Methodism mainly owes that peculiar system of divinity by which her sons in the gospel have been the instruments of converting millions of Adam's apostate race. His was the glorious doctrine of free grace. It is ours! Arminius was theological professor for years in the University of Leyden. May we ever be blessed with such in our day and Church!

A GOLDEN WEDDING.—On the 30th ultimo, Col. W. T. Seaton and Mrs. Seaton, (who is a daughter of Joseph Gales, Sr., and sister of the present senior editor of the Intelligencer,) celebrated their "golden wedding," being the fiftieth anniversary of their married life.

PEN SKETCH OF A CALIFORNIA PREACHER.

The Step Backward.

In one of the middle States, in the year 18—, a young man of Quaker parentage was converted to God, through the instrumentality of the Methodist Church. Almost immediately he felt it to be his duty to call sinners to repentance, and in the capacity of a local minister he began to labor in the surrounding country. His efforts were attended with extraordinary success. Fired with heavenly zeal, of a warm and energetic temperament, he was a burning and a shining light in the church, and the instrument of the awakening and conversion of hundreds of sinners.

By the advice and with the approval of the Church, he began to take steps for entering regularly and permanently the ministerial work. Encouraged by the auspicious opening of his career, his own hopes were bright, and the anticipations of his brethren were of the most sanguine character.

At this juncture, an influential and wealthy friend invited him to come to the city in which he resided, in order to prepare to enter one of the learned professions. The offer was tempting. It promised wealth, position and comfort, in alluring contrast to the poverty, toil and sacrifices of the traveling ministry. The young man hesitated—and it is not strange that he did. In hesitating, he had already partly yielded; for in such cases indecision is in most instances fatal. He was weighing the world and the worth of souls, the Present and the Hereafter, in the balances. He decided, not without much inward conflict, to go to the city and enter upon his professional studies. He did not wholly renounce his ministerial labors—they were only to be subordinate.

His studies were in due time completed, and he entered upon his profession under very favorable circumstances. Soon after, he married a noble Christian woman. Everything gave promise of worldly success and happiness. But he could not be entirely satisfied. An internal voice whispered to him that he had taken a wrong step—a step backward!

His professional success was moderate. His most hopeful enterprises failed; again and again, at the very moment when the prize for which he had turned aside, when he chose his path of life, seemed within his hand, it eluded his eager grasp. As often as he thought himself about to put the cap-stone upon the edifice of his worldly hopes, the whole fabric vanished into thin air. He was not a successful or happy man. He had left the rugged but luminous path of duty, for the apparently flowery ways of the world, and now he felt that the flowers had turned to thorns.

It was not yet too late to retrace his steps. He thought of doing so. But the warmth of his early zeal was in a measure lost; he was entangled with worldly affairs; so he procrastinated, until middle age found him in what he felt to be a false position, and with bitter but unavailing regret that he had yielded to the temptation to take the step backward.

He now felt that it was too late. The time was past when his error might be repaired; so he adjusted himself to the necessities of his position in the gloomy conviction that his life was an irredeemable failure.

He was among the earliest adventurers that rushed to California on the discovery of gold. He came hoping to win the prize that had hitherto eluded his grasp. He worked with energy and enthusiasm, and with partial success. He acquired a competency for his family in a short time. Again he heard the voice that had thrilled his soul in early manhood, saying, Go labour in my vineyard. Again, like unfaithful JONAH, a commission was offered to him by his Lord. In this case, a second call was made—usually there is but one, when that one is deliberately disobeyed. He took charge of a regular pastoral work, and began to preach with zeal and efficiency.

Now he was again to be tested. The sincerity of his consecration, the depth of his devotion were to be tried. A glittering prospect of pecuniary gain was placed before him. With a little effort, immense wealth seemed to be within his reach. He stood again, after the lapse of long years, at the dividing paths. God called—MAMMON allured. He tried to serve both—he would preach and make money at the same time. Strange that his sad experience did not preserve him now from a blunder like this! Strange that he could trust himself again upon the world's treacherous sea!—that he could lean again upon the broken reed that had so deeply pierced his soul.

Again he took a step backward. Of course he failed in the effort to serve God and mammon. He failed in both. The unction of his ministry departed; his glittering hopes of golden treasure were disappointed. He was doubly wrecked. The world had deceived him; he had more ruinously deceived himself. The little property he had accumulated was swallowed up in his unsuccessful enterprises, and at length he was a penniless, disappointed, almost heartbroken man.

Nor did his misfortunes stop here. He lost his eyesight, and went back to the East a bankrupt, blind, with a broken constitution, with heaviness at his heart, and hope almost dead in his soul. With bitter tears he reviewed his career and traced its complete ruin to the step backward taken in the crisis of his fate.

This sketch—which will be recognized by some of our readers—has its counterpart in the history of many who by a single step backward have left the sphere in which God called them to move. The apostle Peter himself had a somewhat similar experience. God made choice of him, that by his mouth the Gentiles should hear the word of the gospel, and, we believe, at the beginning of his ministry was attended with signal success. But he took a step backward. He compromised the gospel in yielding to a clamor among the Jews about circumcision; and from that time there is little more recorded of Peter worthy of the man who preached the pentecostal sermon. The back-bone of his apostolic power appears to have been broken by this step backward.

God will be choosing messengers to carry the gospel of salvation to sinners on this Pacific coast. Some of the young men who read this paper will receive the call. If they would avoid a failure in life, and escape bitter self-reproaches, let them be admonished to TAKE NO STEP BACKWARD!

THE CHINESE EMPIRE.

Rev. R. S. McClay, one of the missionaries of the Northern Methodist Church in China, presents the following thrilling view of the grandeur of the empire, and of the mission field there opened. We find it in the Christian Advocate and Journal.

The Chinese Empire, comprising China proper, Manchuria, Mongolia, Ili, and Thibet, contains an area of 5,000,000 square miles, and a population estimated at 400,000,000. Restricting our view to China proper, or the eighteen provinces, we have the following table: (Book of the world, vol. ii, p. 545.)

	PROVINCES.	Area in sq. miles.	Population in 1812.
SOUTH'N, WEST'N, CEN. EASTERN, NORTH'N.	Pechele, or Chihli,	58,040	27,900,874
	Shantung	65,104	23,358,765
	Shansi	55,268	14,004,200
	Honan	65,104	23,037,171
	Kiang-su, Kiangnan,	45,500	37,843,501
	Ngan-Hwui, Kiangnan,	48,461	34,168,059
	Kiangsi	72,176	33,426,999
	Cheh-kiang	39,150	26,256,784
	Fuh-kien (with Formosa)	58,480	14,777,419
	Hupeh, Hoa Kwang,	70,450	27,370,098
	Hunan, Hoa Kwang,	74,320	18,652,507
	Shensi	67,400	10,267,256
	Kaosuh	86,608	15,193,125
	Sz'Chuen	166,800	21,435,678
	Kwantung (with Huynan)	79,456	19,174,030
	Kwang-si	78,250	7,313,895
	Kwei-chau	64,554	5,288,217
	Yun-nan	107,969	5,561,320
	Total	1,297,999	360,659,900

With regard to the other divisions of the empire, we have no reliable data for estimates of area and population. The following approximate estimates on the subject have been published: Manchuria, area in square miles, 700,000; population 7,000,000, Mongolia, area, in square miles, 1,400,000; population, 14,000,000. Ili, area in square miles, 900,000; population, 9,000,000. Thibet, area in square miles, 700,000; population, 7,000,000. The preceding figures are the approximate estimates for the four divisions of the Chinese Empire last named. It is highly probable, however, that the actual population is greatly in excess of these estimates. From these statistics we learn that the territory embraced within the Chinese Empire is considerably greater than that of all modern Europe. It comprises about one-third of the continent of Asia, or nearly one-tenth of the habitable globe, and contains within its vast area the largest amount of population and wealth ever united under one government in the history of all the world. The eighteen provinces alone contain a population equal to the combined populations of Europe, Africa, and the entire continent of America, furnishing, in fact, about one-third of the population of the globe. The preceding statistics, we trust, will receive the appreciative study of the reader. Their purport may be compressed into one sentence: One-tenth of the habitable globe, one-third of the human race.

The geographical position of China is interesting and auspicious. About one-fifth of her territory lies within the tropics; all the rest is within the north temperate zone. She guards all the southeastern seaboard of a continent on which have transpired the most stupendous events of human history. Her coast is studded with the finest harbors of the world, while her majestic rivers, are second only to those of the American continent. Her climate must be regarded as highly salubrious. This fact is established by meteorological statistics, by the unanimous testimony of the most competent writers on the subject, by the physique of the Chinese, and their average longevity. It would be difficult, we conceive, to find elsewhere in the world an equal extent of unbroken territory so highly favoured in this respect.

Her internal resources are most prolific. The wealth of the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms has been lavished upon her. The fertility of her soil is proverbial. Her mountains are charged with mineral treasures of incalculable value, and her forests teem with nearly every variety of the animal kingdom. She nourishes upon her genial bosom one-third of the human race, and still her resources are only imperfectly developed. So essential are her productions to the comfort and well being of other nations, that the governments of the West have been constrained to combine their influence to open up the empire to foreign commerce. It is highly probable that within a few years China will become one of the great centres of the world's trade, an important point in the highway of nations. Even now the waters of her coast are traversed by ships of nearly every civilized nation.

In olden times, religion, civilization and commerce, passed westward from their primeval seats. The signs of the times now indicate that the order of progress may be changed, and that in the future and greatest epoch of human history, eastward "the star of empire" shall take its way. It would seem, indeed, that the first waves of this returning tide are even now breaking on these shores. By two distinct processes Providence is accomplishing this great result. Westward he has drawn Christian civilization and institutions, to found an empire on the shores of the Pacific whose waves roll upon the coast of China; while eastward, on the shores of the vast Australian continent, he has already planted the pioneers of the same elevating and purifying influences. The rise and consolidation of British power in India, the opening up of Japan, and the increasing vigor of the Dutch and Spanish colonies in the Eastern Archipelago, are all, we think, indications of the same glorious process.

"SAXON", ON STEAM.

"SAXON," the classic and philosophic New Orleans correspondent of the Nashville Christian Advocate, muses in the following elegant and profound manner upon the recent terrible explosion of the steamer Princess.

These occasional explosions are what we must pay for progress, and for the boon of living in the nineteenth century. Nature and the ages are constructed upon the principal of compensation. The most terrific disasters must discount the science of progress, and maintain the equilibrium of the past, present, and future. Probably it was the engineer's fault, but he is cut in two, and there is an end of it. Why look to second causes, where there is an overruling Providence? True, there must have been a cause, but steam is inscrutable when it bursts a boiler, and blows a hundred people into eternity—and only then. Let us not vainly speculate, nor question about the strength of iron and the pressure to the inch, nor ask if the well-known conditions of safe steaming were attended to; rather let us get religion, make our wills, and then travel. In our hurry to get forward, we have not time to consider whether these fearful tragedies might not be dispensed with, by attention of those who build and manage boats. The great point is to get on; our young developing life demands that we get on. Speed is our problem; safety, the study of the coming generations. This reckless spirit of driving on, the impatience of time and space which imbues the times, is what blows up steamboats and smashes railcars.

THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD is now engaged in getting out stone for bridging the Mississippi at Dubuque, Iowa.

MOURNING.

A French writer gives a neat summary of the different observances among mankind, relative to mourning and funeral ceremonies. All the world, says he, is acquainted with the magnificence of the Roman obsequies and funeral-games. The Greeks also burnt the corpses of distinguished men, with funeral feasts, and the lamentations of hired weepers, though they generally displayed a less sumptous grief and a better regulated piety. The Persians buried the bodies of the dead; the Scythians ate them; the Indians enveloped them, for preservation's sake, in a sort of locker; the Egyptians embalmed and dried them, exhibited them on festal days, placed them at the table among their guests, guarded them as their most precious possessions, and loaned and borrowed money upon these strange pledges. In our time, the custom of dancing at funerals is only practised in India, and among some savage nations; but funeral entertainments still prevail in many European countries. Among others the ceremony of interment is solemn and silent, which, nevertheless, does not interfere with the wish that all may be forgotten as speedily as possible. We observe more ostentatious rites for persons of consequence. Their carriages follow them to the grave, and sometimes their horse is paraded, which, having been made to fast, seems to partake of the affliction of the occasion. The Orientals, from whom we borrow this custom, went further—they made horses in funeral processions weep, by blowing a particular kind of powder up their nostrils.

In Italy, the mourning was formerly white for women and brown for men. In China it is white; in Turkey, Syria, and Armenia, it is blue; in Egypt, yellow; in Ethiopia, gray. Each of these colors had originally its mystical signification. White is the emblem of purity, celestial blue indicates the space where the soul ranges after death; yellow, or the tinge of the dead leaves, exhibits the end of all human hopes, and man falling like the leaf of autumn; gray presents the color of earth, our common mother; and black, the funeral costume now adopted throughout Europe and America, is an allusion to the eternal night.

In England the sovereign never wears black; he is clothed in dark purple as mourning. Till the reign of Charles VIII., white was the funeral garb in France. The Emperor Leopold, who died in 1705, used to suffer his beard to grow in disorder, during the whole period of mourning. In this he imitated the Jews. The dowager empresses never left off weeds, and their apartments were hung with black until their death.

The Chancellor of France is the only person who never wears mourning. The brothers, nephews and cousins of Popes never wear it. The happiness of having a Pope in the family is too great to allow them to be affected, even by his death.

But the most remarkable of all these usages, is, perhaps, that of the people of those ancient nations, who dressed themselves as women when they lost their relatives, in order, it is said, that the ridicule attached to their vestments might make them ashamed of their grief.

HENRY GILES ON LYING.

The following passage, from a lecture delivered in Boston by Henry Giles, Esq., has an Erinian ardor combined with terseness, says the Boston Courier, which cannot fail to strike the reader, even if he be not prepared to admit the application to any one hereabouts:

Mr. Giles said—"But then the Irish tell such lies—especially the needy Irish—and, above all, the servant girls! What sinners and exceptions they must be in the midst of surrounding truth! How guilty they must be, with such brilliant examples always and everywhere before them of simplicity, sincerity, veracity and integrity! What severe conscientousness in our parties and their leaders! How scrupulous our press! How full of probity our statesmen! How rigorously verity rules our orators! How genuine is all mercantile commodity and how abhorrent of falsehood is all the world of seller unto buyer! Of what unbended rectitude are all our moneyed corporations; and how honorable, and how like Cæsar's wife, are all their agents! And none of them ever ran away with all the capital in their pocket! The man-servants and maid-servants that could be enpable of a lie in such an age of truth, are surely the most hardened of transgressors! Yet, occasionally, untruth is noticeable in their betters; at least, what simple people might consider untruth. Joseph Surface Goliathan, Esq., has no respect for the sanctity of his own home; he has no respect for the sanctities of other men's homes; but he burns with a sense of indignant virtue when he finds that Biddy went to meet her lover, when she said she went to see aunt! Yet Joseph Surface Goliathan, Esq., thinks lies, breathes lies, sleeps lies, drinks lies, and has lies paid to him; is himself a conglomerated lie; will die in falsehood, and his ashes, after his death, will be consecrated by a lying epitaph. For much and many, Joseph Surface Goliathan, Esq., is a representative.

BENJAMIN D'ISRAELI.

One of the most striking exemplifications of the invincibleness of a strong will, and the power of a perseverance directed to the accomplishment of a single object, is to be found in the history of this Jewish Statesman in the British Parliament. A correspondent of the Christian Advocate and Journal, describes this history, in connection with his recent appearance in the House of Commons in behalf of the Government Reform Bill.

Monday was a great day for the Right Honorable Benj. D'Israeli, Her Majesty's Chancellor of the Exchequer. I cannot say precisely how many years have passed away, but it must have been from twenty to two and twenty since Benj. D'Israeli, son of the well-known author of the "Curiosities of Literature," himself already distinguished as a novelist of more than ordinary genius, rose in his place in Parliament to deliver his maiden speech. That so young a man, without rank or family, should have been able to obtain a place even in a Reformed Parliament, may be taken as a proof that there was something in him that promised eminence in the House. His opinions at first, like those of Bulwer, were decidedly radical, and as a radical he entered Parliament. He was a handsome man, but unmistakably Jewish, with a head of abundant black hair, hanging in glossy ringlets. There were great expectations as to his debut, especially among the Radicals. But the Parliament of 1838 was not indulgent to young geniuses, especially if they were novelists. Bulwer was taught this painfully, but no one so painfully as D'Israeli. His style and his gesticulations were offensive to the House. In vain did he attempt to proceed with his carefully prepared oration; he was overwhelmed with ridicule; he was coughed and laughed down. The scene undoubtedly was disgraceful, and now-a-days such scenes do not occur. As, after repeated unavailing efforts, he at length was just about to take his seat, he hurled out from between his teeth the defiant prophecy, "The day will come when you'll hear me!" Now that word is fulfilled. Genius and ambition, daring and persevering energy, have triumphed. There is no more distinguished or commanding speaker in the Commons' House than B. D'Israeli. He has fixed his mark high; he chose distinguished men for the butt of his resolute and well prepared attacks, and thus he rose. Soon he left the Radicals, for opposition he saw was his cue; satire and invective his forte; the outs would welcome his talent; as an antagonist to men in office he could best obtain a hearing. For years he set himself to criticise and oppose the foreign policy and the appointment of Palmerston then Minister for Foreign Affairs; then he set his mark higher still, and chose Peel as his butt. His attacks upon Sir Robert were never exceeded in caustic but most polished satire, in cutting wit, in withering sarcasm, in keen invective. It was a terrible game he played, and greatly Sir Robert must have suffered. I suppose that D'Israeli's was the bitterness of disappointed ambition. Sir Robert had declined to put him into office. At length, reluctant and recalcitrant as the Tory party may have been, the day came when they were compelled to accept D'Israeli as their leader in the Commons. His transcendant ability as an debater and orator, his power of application, his audacity, combined with great dexterity, his unfailing tact and resource, have put the Israelitish, adventurer at the head of the proud aristocratic conservative party of England. Something of the peculiar heat and genius of his race may have worked in him when some years ago, he first took office as Chancellor of the Exchequer, the financier of his party. People say that the minister was dressed on Monday night precisely as he had been on that evening when the House had refused to hear him. His dress is sometimes a little loose or careless; he wears not unfrequently a extravagant coat hanging on his shoulders. But on that night he wore a black surtout, beautifully fitting, white waistcoat, and dark brown trowsers; and now he hid his triumph! All the world was listening for the first notes of his speech; every telegraph from London was in requisition to carry his words to every part, not only of this kingdom but of Europe.

NAPLES AND ITS KING.

At the latest dates from Europe the King of Naples was again reported to be at the point of death. This time there is little doubt that it is so far true that he cannot live many weeks or days. His bodily ailments are pronounced incurable; he lies prostrate and helpless, and already government is administered provisionally for him, in his own name. Before long, he will have passed away, and his son, a young man of twenty-three years of age, will rule in his place as Francis II. He will succeed to an inheritance of trouble, in times that will require a force of character and high qualities for government which it is feared he does not possess. He has no bad reputation, not merely for personal vices—which great responsibilities and a high regard for them might cure—but for a dull and obstinate adhesion to the despotic ideas which have made his father's rule so hateful and his name so odious. In the turbulent condition of Italian politics, the accession of a young, incompetent and rash prince might be the occasion for internal disturbances, and encouragement to extend plotting which would involve all Italy in sanguinary conflicts. The death of the remorseless old tyrant, therefore, may be the signal for wide-spread attempts at change and revolution.

The dying monarch, although he has reigned for nearly thirty years, is not yet fifty years old. His father died in 1830, leaving him the throne at the age of twenty years—he was born in 1810. A king, at that early age, of one of the finest countries in Europe, has lived without having done any good thing to be remembered for, and dies, scarcely past middle life, in bodily decrepitude and mental decay, under the contempt of the world, and with the abhorrence of the great body of his subjects. For many years his family and dynastic relations with the great European families and monarchies and their common interest to maintain legitimate succession against popular risings—against established order—have been the sole influences which have kept him on his throne.

A brief notice of the intimate connections of the Neapolitan family with other royal houses of Europe, will show how closely they are intermixed together.

The first wife of his father, Francis I., was sister to the Emperor of Austria; his aunt was wife of Louis Phillipe, King of the French. His mother was sister of Ferdinand of Spain. His own eldest sister—his father's daughter by the Austrian princess—was the celebrated Duchess de Berri, married to the son of Charles X. of France. His next full sister is Queen Christine, the Queen Dowager mother of Queen Isabella of Spain. Another is married to Don Francis, and a third to Count Trapani of the royal house of Spain—both of whom were candidates for the hand of Donna Isabella, notwithstanding their nearness of blood. The children of Francis were thirteen in number—the present king, five brothers and seven sisters.

King Ferdinand married, at the age of 22, the daughter of Victor Emanuel, King of Savoy, sister of the present King, Charles Albert. She died shortly after his birth. His second wife was an Austrian Arch Duchess.

The royal house of Naples is a branch of the Bourbons, descended through Philip VII. of Spain from Louis XIV. of France. Naples was an appendage of the Spanish crown until it was ceded in 1759—exactly one hundred years ago—by Charles IV. of Spain, to his third son, Ferdinand, from whom these Bourbons are descended, with another admixture of Spanish blood by intermarriages since.

The kingdom of Naples—or, more properly speaking, the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, For Napies is only applied to the continental part—comprises the whole which is geographically known as Southern or Lower Italy, and the large Island of Sicily, with some adjacent isles. Together, they contain about eight and a half millions of inhabitants—of which the continental portion has something over six millions and a quarter, and the islands over two millions. It has a most delightful climate, a most productive soil, and is full of the most interesting relics of classical times, but it is so misgoverned and oppressed by a bad government, and by swarms of idle privileged classes, that the people are poor and heavily taxed, and therefore idle and discontented, and ready to revolt. In all Europe there is not a government so thoroughly detested, and so thoroughly worthy of detestation, as that which this dying monarch is about to bequeath to his son, who is said to be as incapable and as tyrannous as his father.

AN ARGUMENT AGAINST CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

The Christian Advocate and Journal, noticing the celebrated German journal, the "Theological Studies and Criticisms" (Theologische Studien und Kritiken) the oldest of the theological journals of the evangelical party of Germany, gives a synopsis of an article on the above subject, by Prelate Mehring, of Wirtemberg. In opposition to nearly all the orthodox divines, and most of the Christian jurists, of Germany, it attempts to show that no passage of the Bible recommends the continuance of the death penalty in a Christian community, and that the spirit of Christianity is decidedly opposed to it. Its first part reviews the passages of the Scripture usually adduced by the defenders of the death penalty in its favor. It admits that the penalty did occur in the state law of Moses, but denies that this in any way binds a Christian community; as, for example, the penalty for incest, according to the Mosaic law, (Levit. xx, 11,) was death, but according to the New Testament (1 Cor. v.) exclusion from the Church. Of the passage in Gen. ix, 6, ("Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood, be shed,") on which generally a particular stress is laid, it is remarked that at all events it cannot express or order, because then even the permission of pardoning the murderer would be excluded, and because in that case God himself would not have forbidden to have the penalty of death inflicted on the first murderer. (Gen. iv, 15.) We are further reminded by the author, that the future tense of the Hebrew language admits not only the translation, "By man shall his blood be shed," but also the other, by man will his blood be shed, which latter translation, would make the second sentence to express merely the consequences to which a murderer will expose himself on the part of the outraged feelings of his fellow-men. In a similar way the most important passage of the New Testament, in Matthew xxvi, 52, ("Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword,") is explained as a pointing out of the consequences, which every one who appeals to the decision of brute force must be ready to abide. As still less of a proof, the passage in Rom. xiii, 4 ("for he, the ruler, beareth not the sword in vain") is considered, the sword being generally, in Scriptural language, a symbol of power, without necessarily implying the idea of destruction, as in Ephes. vi, 17, "The sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." The death of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts v. 5) is not admitted to be proof, as in this case it was not man, but God himself who inflicted the penalty. Having thus reviewed all the more important passages that seem to refer to the subject, the author thinks he has conclusively shown that the Scriptural arguments in favor of the death penalty are at least far from having a convincing force. He thereupon proceeds to the examination of the question, whether the death penalty is in accordance with the whole spirit of the Gospel. Here is a large scope for philosophical speculations, in which our author freely indulges, and into which we have no time to follow him, step for step. He dwells especially on that conception of justice which is said to require the death of the criminal, and which is defined as a removal of the wrong, and of the disturbance of the Divine order produced thereby, and argues that human justice, in inflicting the death penalty, does not limit itself to the removal of the wrong, but takes a bold step further, by removing even the life of the criminal himself. Thus human justice shows itself as essentially and merely destructive, while the justice of the Gospel appears everywhere to have a concern for human life.

HISTORY OF THE PIANO.

THE Boston Express has an interesting article on the Piano, a condensation of which we think will be of interest to our readers: fifty years ago the instruments, though very inferior to those of the present day, commanded extravagant prices, and were within the reach of but few. Piano-forte players, too, were quite as rare as the instruments; but now, when the prices of the instruments bring them within the means of almost all classes, a knowledge of the piano constitutes the chief part of a lady's accomplishments.

The writer proceeds to say that the Piano-forte of to day was not an invention by itself—no one pretends to find a claimant for it. It has been perfected step by step, through a succession of ages; and probably the thing first conceived, which ultimately led to something like a Piano, no more resembled a Piano-forte than a boot-jack resembles one of Grover & Baker's nicely working sewing machines.

The first approach to it, or the first idea which finally developed the Piano, was an instrument called the psalterion or tympanum, which was simply a box, across which strings or wires were placed, and tuned so as to form the common scale in music. The sounds were produced by striking the strings or wires with two light hammers, one held in each hand. It was an instrument of Greek origin, though much in use by the Hebrews. The instrument known as the Dulcimer of the present day, bore a nearer resemblance to it than any instrument with which we are acquainted.

The invention of the Clavichord was the next step towards the manufacture of the Piano-forte. This instrument was an improvement on the psalterion or tympanum, a keyboard for the first time being used, by which small plates of copper were made to act upon the strings. After the Clavichord, another instrument called the Clanictherian, in which catgut strings were substituted for wires, and acted upon by soft-leather hammers.

Another instrument, which it is said Queen Elizabeth was fond of playing upon, was called the Virginal. It was a keyed instrument, wire metallic strings vibrated by quills attached to the ends of levers. It probably derived its name from the fact that the Virgin Queen held it in high estimation.

The Spinet was of similar construction to the Virginal. It was formed, however, like the square Piano of a much later period.

The Harpsichord, a much later invention, was first known about the year 1530. Its shape was similar to that of the grand Piano-forte, had two rows or banks of keys and could be used together or separately, the lower bank giving at the same touch the notes of the upper. In this instrument the jack, with a moveable tongue, through which was passed a quill, was first used, but so different in its effects upon the string that some writer satirically describes the tone as "a scratch with a sound at the end of it." However harsh and disagreeable the tones of this instrument must have been, compared to the poorest Pianos now in use, we would remind the instrument connoisseur that the fine productions of the Bachs, Beethoven, Handel, Mozart, Clements, and others were composed upon it.

Many years later, a maker of musical instruments of Paris, by the name of Marius, improved the action by the substition of small hammers instead of quills. A Florentine, by the name of Christophero, so much improved the discovery of Marius, that it may be said to form the basis of most of the subsequent improvements, and, in fact, he may claim to have the first Piano-forte. It could be made to play both loud and soft—hence the name of Piano-forte. The next great improvements were made in the year 1790, by Zampa of London, who met with so great success that he realized a handsome fortune in the manufacture of them, the demand for his instruments being greater on the Continent than at home.

A rival establishment to Zampa's was soon in operation in Germany, under the auspices of Silberman, and another at Paris, by the brothers Erard. Still the English Pianos maintained their superiority for some time, and Clement Kirkman, and one or two others, divided the business if not the honors with Zampa, of making the best Pianos for many years. The celebrated instruments of Broadwood are of later date.

The descendants of the Erards, however, now claim to make the best Pianos in the world, and we understand that English makers do not pretend to dispute their claim to superiority.

The writer then states that in this country first class Pianos have not been made more than a quarter of a century, and claims that the world is indebted to the late Jonas Chickering, of Boston, for his perseverance and ingenuity in perfecting the instrument. C. made his Piano in 1820, and up to January 8, 1859, the round number of twenty thousand have been manufactured by him and his successors, Messrs. Chickering & Sons. There are many other Boston manufacturers, whose efforts, the writer says, are well appreciated by the community, and whose Pianos are held in deserved estimation. He mentions no manufacturers of the instrument out of Boston—not even Knabe, of Baltimore, whose instruments are fast coming into notice and popular favor.

APOLOGETIC.

The arm to which is attached the hand that does the writing for this paper, has been rendered useless for some times past by an "entangling alliance" with an "ugly customer" denominated "rheumatism." The paper has had to get along as well as it could under the circumstances, and contributions, official and private correspondence, etc., have necessarily been neglected for the time being. "There is a better time a-coming," we trust.

FOR CALIFORNIA.

Tuesday morning Bishop Pierce, accompanied by his wife and little daughter, arrived in this city, en route for California. He takes out with him three preachers, Rev. J. W. Simmons, from Georgia, Rev. Mr. Derrick, from East Tennessee, and Rev. D. W. Epps, from Arkansas. Rev. J. C. Kolbe, from Texas, has already gone. They are all in fine health and spirits. They will spend about a week in the city, and leave by the overland route through Texas, via Shreveport, Marshall, Austin, and San Antonio. The Bishop, at all the places he visits, is soliciting funds to assist in erecting a Southern Methodist Church in San Francisco. We trust he will receive ample encouragement in this cause, wherever he goes. He claims only five hundred dollars from New Orleans. We hope he will receive a thousand.

THE MISSIONARY ANNIVERSARY.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to call attention in a few words to the approaching Missionary Anniversary in Mobile. We are anticipating a season of great interest, not only from the presence of the distinguished men who are to take part in the exercises of the occasion, but from the presence of many of our friends from the country. We hope to see every important point of the interior represented on that occasion. And we trust our friends will come prepared to make liberal subscriptions to the Missionary Cause. All sums pledged by members of the Church out of Mobile, can be credited to the Circuits and Stations to which they respectively belong. And the money, so pledged, can be paid at any time before the next Conference.

I confess that I feel a strong desire, not only that the collection shall be a large one, but that many of our influential men, in the various portions of our work, shall be present, and enjoy the benefit of the light and information that will be imparted upon the general subject of missions, and upon our operations in that field, as a Church. Come brethren, and have your views expanded, and your souls fired with new ardor. J. HAMILTON.

AMERICAN CHAPEL IN PARIS.

A correspondent of the Evangelist, in a recent letter from Paris, thus speaks of the American chapel in Paris:

"Rev. Mr. Lampson, of New York, a young Episcopalian clergyman, was present and read that portion of the service, which, by mutual agreement, is used in the morning service; he also delivered a well-arranged and instructive sermon. In the afternoon, Rev. Mr. Kempshall, of Rochester, New York, preached, and, as is usual, the services were wholly Congregational. It would seem difficult, if not impossible, to engraft upon one Church, so that it would be satisfactory, the Episcopal and Presbyterian forms of worship, yet with a large spirit of conciliation and desire for Christian union, it has thus far been done, and with success. Lord Cowley, the British Minister and family, and Hon. Mr. Mason, the American Minister and family, were all present today. Every State in the Union probably was represented on Sunday, in the audience in the chapel.

It is gratifying to be able to state what New Yorkers have done for the enterprise, independent of their subscriptions. Mr. Woolsey has given them an organ, which, although not complete, is in use, and Mr. Aspinwall has presented the Church with a beautiful communion service. The communion table and two handsome arm chairs, are the gift of Mrs. Woolsey. The previous Sabbath, Rev. Dr. Prentiss, of the Mercer-street Church, on his way to Switzerland, with improved health, occupied the pulpit with Rev. Mr. Seeley. He was gratified with the success of the whole enterprise. Mr. Wm. E. Dodge, of New York, who was also present, last Sabbath, can make a favorable report of the encouraging prospects of the chapel, on his return, and, it is to be hoped, secure for it further contributions.

P. S.—Since the above was written, I learn that Mr. Lampson has just made a formal written request of Mr. Seeley, that a portion of the Sabbath be set apart for the exclusive use of the chapel for Episcopal worship. Mr. Seeley, not feeling authorized to grant such a request, gave a decided negative answer; consequently, Mr. Lampson is seeking another place, where he designs to establish a new Episcopal Church for the Americans. He assures me he comes to Paris exclusively on his own responsibility, and not with the written application of three American Bishops, Williams, of Connecticut, Doane, of New Jersey, and Potter, of New York. This movement is deeply to be regretted, as it is but the beginning of denominational division, when thus far a union of all evangelical Christians has promised such eminent success, in connection with the American chapel."

W. A.

We think Mr. Lampson is right. When will this impracticable "Union" humbug cease to fritter away the strength of the Christian Churches? Love each other, but live in your own houses, and do your own work, in your own way. Ed. N. O. Ch. Ad.

REVIVAL IN CHARLESTON.

The Young Men's Christian Association is conducting a morning prayer-meeting in the Wentworth street Baptist Church. The attendance is good, and some of the meetings have been very edifying. In the Spring-street Church, Brother Kennedy has been conducting a night-meeting, with the help of other Methodist pastors, for a week past, and about twenty have joined the Church. Last night (we write on Monday morning) a meeting was commenced in Trinity Cuhrch by brother [illegible], and it is to be continued through the week or longer. The promise is good not only in this, but in all the [illegible] Churches, for a gracious season of revival, and the hearts of prayerful Christians are much encouraged. [Southern Christian Advocate.

REV. A. M. SHIPP.

We regret to learn that Rev. A. M. Shipp has sent in his resignation as Professor of History in the University of North Carolina, to take effect at the close of the current session.

For nearly ten years, Professor Shipp has occupied his present position, with credit to himself and usefulness to the country.

We presume, as a matter of course, that he will be elected President of Wofford College in June, but are not aware that his resignation looks to that event. Wherever his field of usefulness may be, we emphatically say to Methodists, that he is entitled to their grateful affection and prayers. [North Carolina Christian Advocate.

RESIGNATION OF DR. BUSHNELL.—Rev. Dr. Bushnell last Sunday resigned the pastorage of the North Congregational Church of Hartford, Ct.

THE DEPOSITORIES.

Not long since we noticed the generous movement of the citizens of Galveston to pay the Depository building there out of debt. This is encouraging, as far as it goes. The regular business of the Depository is said to be promising. We trust to hear still more favorable accounts.

From the Depository at Vicksburg, we have not had late accounts. We imagine, however, from the zeal and energy of the chief Agent, Rev. H. H. Montgomery, supported by the special favor of the Financial Secretary, that it must be doing well. Our impression has been that it has, also, the support of many of the leading ministers and wealthy laymen of the Mississippi Conference. We should rejoice to hear of its success, and, therefore, hope to hear occasionally from its Agents.

As to the Alabama Depository at Mobile, our readers have already been fully advised. In addition to previous items, we learn by private correspondence that Rev. Dr. Neely has succeeded in raising about $6,000 in Marion, Ala., and vicinity, for the Depository and Publishing House. This is liberal and encouraging.

The Agents of the Memphis Depository are reported to be succeeding well in their mission.

The Georgia Conference Depository at Macon, has just been inaugurated, not upon the Abbey Plan, but on a plan of its own, not necessarily including the "Genealogical Bible,"

The Charleston Depository, an old establishment, in a good commercial location, adapted to the supply of the Conferences patronizing the Southern Advocate, is doing well.

Of the Depository at Richmond, Dr. Lee, writing to the Southern Advocate, says: "It will be opened on the 15th of May. Mr. George L. Bidgood, trained to the book business, and for several years principal clerk in the house of Messrs. Jas. Woodhouse, & Co., of Richmond, was elected Agent. He and Mr. R. C. Smiley, late clerk of the Depository, are now engaged in taking an inventory of the stock on hand, preparatory to its purchase of the General Agent of the Publishing House. The Agents of our Conference Society have met with encouraging success. It is a somewhat singular coincidence that at the organization of the Society at Conference, sixty shares of stock, $6,000, were taken; and at the recent meeting of the Board, each of the Agents reported the sale of sixty-one shares, $12,200; a total of $18,200, as a starting point for our operations."

Of the Depository proposed in North Carolina, a correspondent of the Nashville Advocate says: "Brother Abbey's great Bible is not popular over here; our people say it looks like a "gift enterprise," or a bait of some kind. Dr. McFerrin writes a spicy notes sometimes to our Advocate, and our people admire his talents, but the terms upon which he proposes to furnish our agent with books are not applauded. Now, it is fashionable as well as very easy to say a few sharp things about the Old North State, and then contrast her with Alabama, Tennessee, and some other States. This is all useless; it will be found in the end that this Conference, small as it is, will achieve as great results as any of her sisters. Our people will think, perhaps, a little too slowly. Slowly, therefore, but surely, you will yet see an immense Depository here, aiding the Publishing House as much as any other, and financially sound as the pure gold."

The Depository at St. Louis has been in operation for a number or years, and is, no doubt, steadily increasing in business,

The New Orleans Depository is doing better than it has ever done before, by about fifty per cent. The sales are constantly increasing, and as full a supply as possible is constantly kept on its shelves. All its profits go to the Publishing House, and it will prove an increasing support to that establishment. It is not a Conference Depository, but simply an Agency or Branch of the Publishing House.

In this connection we wish to say that, in reference to the mere model differences, in different Conferences, in endowing the Publishing House, and promoting the sale of our literature, this paper has not become the partisan advocate of any one view. Respecting Conference rights as to mode, while earnestly supporting our general publishing interests, it has not only been perfectly impartial, but has done what it could for the success of each different movement. By such a course, it is hoped that confusion, antagonism and injury, will be avoided, the same goal reached by different routes; and that, having "proved all things," we shall be prepared to "hold fast that which is good." Let those, of all sections and all movements, therefore, understand, once for all, that they are not only welcome to the columns of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, for the advancement of the general cause; but that in its editorial management, they will receive all practicable encouragement and help.

EAST FLORIDA.

THE FLORIDA Home Companion, of June 26, says: Here, in East Florida, we have abundant provision crops, fine lands, and want is never known. Our soil is adapted to the cultivation of Indian corn; hammock lands, producing from twenty-five to fifty bushels to the acre; long and short staple cotton, in quantity equal to any in the world, sugar, rice, potatoes, peas, tobacco, cassava, and arrowroot; all remunerating crops. We are subject to no overflows; and being within tropical influence, we can count with certainty upon the regular "rainy season" of this latitude. There is no contingency of drought—no fears of parched up crops, from May till September. Think of it, ye boasters of "cotton blooms on the first of June," in the short-cotton States of the West—think of our magnificent cotton fields, with crops now standing six feet high, and glowing with golden flowers; the limbs freighted down with pods almost ready to burst into fleecy silkiness of fibre; corn fields, yellow in ripened fullness, ready for the harvester's wains; cane fields waving and elaborating their mellow juices; herds of sleek cattle grazing in our natural pastures: and the prospects of peace and plenty on all hands. Think of these prospects, ye who are looking for new settlements, and follow the stout hearts who are now opening the wilderness around us, and flecking its bosom with homes of refinement and retreats of elegance and hospitality. Railroads are piercing the country in every direction. Our broad rivers are spreading their lake-like bosoms to floating palaces, bearing rich freights to and from our ports. East Florida is rapidly presenting attractions to those planters who loves a fine climate, rich lands, and exuberant productions. Her destiny is all in the future. Her natural advantages are superior to any land we have ever seen, and her progress depends on the intelligence, integrity, honesty and prudence of those who will be called to administer her public affairs. Judicious laws, wise government, and honest public men, always concentrate a good and virtuous population, where they obtain; and with these elements blessing a country, its destiny is to flourish and become an ornament to the age in which it exists.

NEW SCHOOLS IN TURKEY.

It is intended to establish in Constantinople three great schools for the training of candidates for the office of moodir, that is, the chief magistrate of towns and colleges. The buildings have already been assigned, and a committee is occupied with their organization. These schools promise to be of great importance, for in the provinces almost the whole administration lies in the hands of these officers; and their ignorance and overbearingness has always been one of the principal causes of the cruel oppression of the Christians. If the government should thus be enabled to lean, in carrying out its reformatory measures, upon a staff of enlightened Christian magistrates, it will be another great advance toward the final victory of Christian civilization.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

Sickles Trial—Drs. Marshall and Young—"Let me Kiss Him for His Mother's"—Smithson's Book—That Sermon—In Baltimore—Dr. Strickland—Missionary Collection in New York.

WASHINGTON CITY, APRIL 11, 1859.

Doubtless there are many persons among your readers in North Louisiana, who, if they shall chance to see my initials at the close of this letter, will hasten to see if there is anything said in it upon a subject they feel deeply interested in; and of which they regard me, as in some kind, the embodiment. Indeed, it sometimes seems to me my friends imagine that I don't think of anything, don't care to talk of anything, don't know anything that is not in some way connected with the very subject that I don't intend to mention at all in this letter; and yet, as you see, "out of the fullness of the heart" the mouth desires to speak.

The trial of Mr. Sickles is progressing in this city, and the excitement attending it is very great. Just now, Robert J. Walker has been on the witness stand, and that portion of his testimony in which he described the mental agony and suffering evinced by the prisoner, consequent upon the dishonor he had suffered, so overcame Mr. Sickles that he had to be borne from the room, and cordials administered. This case is one of peculiar and exciting interest in many points of view—but after all, there is little in it calculated to cause alarm for the state of society; nor am I willing to join those who are ready to pronounce the whole affair nothing more than the legitimate fruit of fashionable life. I believe there is much purity, and a high standard of virtue in the higher classes of society in all our cities. That a man is occasionally found, so destitute of principle and honor as to hold no relation sacred, despise the restraints of society, the obligations of friendship, and the laws of hospitality, and be ready at any time to dishonor the names of those he should hold in highest esteem; and that such a monster should occasionally find a frail creature weak enough to yield to his solicitations—is not so much to be wondered at, as the infrequency of these occurences among those who live, as if they had deliberately made choice to take their portion in this world, and think of no other heaven than the "club-room" or the "hop."

I have spent one Sabbath in Washington. It was Quarterly meeting, and Dr. Marshall, of Mississippi, preached at eleven o'clock. In the course of his sermon he read with great effect some beautiful lines, written by a lady of Vicksburg upon the touching incident given in the N. O. Advocate, of the lady kissing the corpse of the young man, for his mother, who was a stranger and had died of yellow fever. The congregation was bathed in tears. It was good to be there. By the by, that little incident, which has awakened responsive sympathies in the breasts of thousands of readers (I suppose no one ever read it without shedding tears) has inspired the pens of four different poets; the one, above alluded to; one, an unknown contributor to one of the Richmond papers; one, a lady in this city; and one, an authoress of celebrity. In the evening, Dr. Young, of Louisiana, occupied the pulpit. I suppose Dr. Marshall got ashamed of his traveling companion, as they parted next morning and have not seen each other since.

I have had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of our brother, Smithson, and the second edition of his "Methodist Pulpit, South," is before me. It is in the highest style of art. Several sermons are added, which add value to the book. On thumbing over the pages to look at the pictures, my eyes rested upon a familiar face; and turning to the opposite page I saw—"The Intermediate State." The first sentence fixed the attention, and the book was not closed until the sermon was ended and the conviction was fastened upon the mind: "that is the best sermon in the book," though I have heard the last one in it pronounced the best. The Louisiana Conference may well be proud of her contributions to this work, which will find its way, I trust, into the library of every Southern Methodist.

Last Sabbath I spent in Baltimore—"lying over"—as the traveling phrase is. The weather was inclement, and I had a quiet day of it. I knew nobody and nobody knew me; and I was glad enough of it. In the morning I heard the regular pastor of the Charles Street Church, Rev. Mr. Dashiell, on the superiority of revealed over natural religion, from "Ye believe in God, believe also in me." Forty minutes were occupied in showing the insufficiency of Deism to meet the wants of fallen man; and right well and eloquently it was done and said. The sufficiency of Jesus Christ to satisfy all the demands of our nature was reserved for a future occasion. The closing hymn was read with an emphasis and manner, and in a spirit so much improved, as to suggest the possibilty of an apprehension that the opening exercises might, perchance, in a degree eclipse the discourse which should follow. In the evening the Presiding elder, —— Sewell, preached in the same house a very solemn and impressive sermon on the Transfiguration, to a large and intensely interested congregation.

On the Friday preceding, four men—three white men and one negro—were hung for murder in Baltimore. The cases had peculiar local interest, on account of the respectable family connections of the white men. Bad company ruined them all. Let the young take warning!

A few days were spent in the neat, quiet, orderly city of brotherly love. The actual improvement since I stopped there before, seventeen years ago, has been very great, but relatively it has fallen far behind New York, which is the great focus of commerce and of monied power and influence. Judging from what I saw and heard in Philadelphia, I should think the free negroes and abolitionists have the supremacy.

In New York I met an old friend, Dr. Strickland, author of the "Pioneer Bishop." I knew him well, and loved him, when he lived in the log cabin—which is accurately represented in the first illustration of his "Pioneers of the West." In that cabin, the scriptures were studied in Hebrew and Greek, there prayers were offered which God has doubtless answered, and there sermons were composed which have pleased and blessed the most enlightened congregations of hearers in our largest cities. He is a nobly generous, whole souled Christian gentleman, of enlarged and liberal views. On Subbath in New York at James street Church, the regular annual Missionary collection was taken. In the morning Bishop James preached an appropriate and impressive sermon. In the afternoon three young men—Waugh, Thoburn, and Judd—missionaries, under appointment to India, then about to sail, gave their experiences, touching their call to that work. One of the young gentlemen touched the heart, and moistened every eye in the house. The collections were taken very quietly. The pan was first passed, and then cards, large and ruled into columns for names, residences and amounts. There was no effort to get up an excitement; nothing to make one laugh; no bantering to provoke one another to do the generous thing, no pleasant stories told; no one played the clown, nobody to auction off diamond rings or young ladies' breast pins—no kind of clap-trap to catch people in a manner to make them think afterward they had been fooled out of their money, and wonder if any of it would ever get to India. It was a solemn service. The people gave, as if they were engaged in deep and earnest prayer that God would accept the offering and sanctify it to the conversion of the heathen world. In the evening, Brother Young, a stranger, preached. The weather had improved and the congregation with it, so as to crowd the house. At the close of the discourse, without another word, the collection was again taken in the same manner, "decently and in order," and altogether reached about one thousand dollars, fully meeting the expectations.

The sun was out and the weather was warm and pleasant this afternoon, and I walked through the capitol and public grounds, until I could walk no more. It is a beautiful place. The walks are kept clean and nice; the grass is green; the shade trees are putting forth their leaves; the little fish are swimming in the pools; a fountain is playing its waters high as the smaller trees, and as the jet turns beautifully over and falls towards the white marble rocks, and the sunshine falls upon the spray, it forms a bright rainbow, which is continually changing as it is fanned by the breeze, like changeable silk. Such an evening as this there are a great many well-dressed gentlemen and ladies promenading the walks, and pleasant, smiling, happy children running in every direction—little boys driving the hoop, and little girls jumping the rope. Sometimes a fine band of music comes there and plays for the people. One thing I notice in Washington, no place that I have ever been in, large or small, where people stare so at you! I suppose it is from a curiosity to know whether it is not one of the great men they see. The stranger may be a foreign minister, an English nobleman, Governor of one of the States, may be a future President—or a real one, for aught they know.

But, dear reader, I expect you are tired—and so am I. Good night!

C. G. Y.

THE STRONGEST MORAL POSITION YET.

WE find the following in Zion's Herald, the organ of the New England anti-slavery Methodists. It says:

"The leading organ of the Church, South, (Nashville Christian Advocate) has had some discussion lately with the New York Christian Advocate on slavery, in which it charges the New York paper with withholding from its readers what is said on the other side. Such a practice in newspaper discussion is exceedingly provoking. In the course of its remarks, it says:"

"Will the editor, or any of his Boston allies, point out a letter or a line in the apostolic writings that "proposes to extirpate slavery?" Where and when did they make "allowances" for it, with the jesuitical intent of more effectually working its extinction under favorable circumstances? What cowards those apostles must have been, and what double-dealing they were guilty of, to be sure! In the presence of master and slave, they never said, nor even hinted, that the relation was sinful, wrong, evil; but laid down rules for its government. They did not stand upon "the difficulties" that "beset" other evils, if sacred history be true. But, alas, on this subject, they were sold to the cotton-power—their mouths were locked.

"We demur, for the credit of Christianity, for the sake of the respect and authority due to its inspired tenohers, to such miserable stuff. Let not abolitionists make out the apostles such trimmers and time-servers as themselves. They have even gone so far as to say that "allowances" must be made for the apostles on this point."

"If by 'Boston allies' the editor refers to us, we beg leave to enter a demurrer: 'We don't believe in such 'miserable stuff.' We honor the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for taking a manly position, though we think that position is totally wrong.' The actual position of our Church now is not defensible, either theologically or logically. It ought at once to be changed. The New York Christian Advocate says:"

"Northern Methodism, while it admits that the institution may be tolerated, (not sanctioned) in some circumstances among the laity, for the good of the slave, and on account of the local difficulties which beset it, and only so long as such difficulties do beset it, and only for the safer removal of them, does not tolerate it in her ministry for the obvious reason that preachers, not being business or secular men, need not be subjected to those difficulties."

"Now whoever defends such an unreasonable practice as that, simply because it exists, shows that he is under the influence of the maxim, "Whatever is, is right." It is the quintessence of stupid conservatism. If it is right for the laity to hold slaves, it is right for the ministry and vice versa. Moreover, if Church members are allowed to hold slaves they will buy and sell, and ought to be permitted to do so. There is no reasonable course for us but to condemn all slaveholding, and acknowledge that we have done wrong in ever allowing it.

"As it regards the inquiry of the Nashville Advocate, we will remember it, and consider it when we have more room."

We must say that the out-spoken, unselfish candor of the above commands our admiration and esteem. It is the first time that the Church, North, has been represented in her true position by one of her own organs, since the division in 1844. "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light." Zion's Herald has this day the strongest moral position of any paper in the Church, North. It is sincere and consistent. Dr. Haven may not be equal to Dr. Steven's in tactics, but he is far before him in logic and ethics. "We honor" him "for taking a manly position, though we think that position is totally wrong." In all kindness and sincerity, however, we fear he has committed himself to a dangerous task in the last paragraph of the above. He is the only Northern Methodist editor who would dare as much.

BLOOD.

BLOOD is a mighty river of Life, the mysterious centre of chemical and vital uctions as wonderful as they are indespensable, soliciting our attention no less by the many problems it presents to speculative ingenuity, than by the many practical conclusions to which those speculations lead. It is a torrent impetuously rushing through every part of the body, carried by an elaborate net-work of vessels, which, in the course of the twelve months, convey to the various tissues not less than three thousand pounds' weight of nutritive material, and convey from the various tissues not less than three thousand pounds' weight of waste. At every moment of our lives there is nearly ten pounds of this fluid, rushing in one continuous throbbing stream, from the heart through the great arteries, which branch and branch like a tree, the vessels becoming smaller and smaller as they subdivide, till they are invisible to the naked eye, and then they are called capillaries (hair-like vessels), although they are no more to be compared in calibre with hairs than hairs are with cables. These vessels form a net-work finer than the finest lace—so fine, indeed, that if we pierce the surface at almost any part with the point of a needle, we open one of them, and let out its blood. In these vessels the blood yields some of its nutrient materials, and receives in exchange some of the wasted products of tissue; thus modified, the stream continues its rapid course backwards to the heart, through a system of veins which commence in the myriad capillaries that form the termination of the arteries. The veins, instead of subdividing like the arteries, become gradually less and less numerous, their twigs entering branches, and the branches, trunks, till they reach the heart. No sooner has the blood poured into the heart from the veins, than it rushes through the lungs, and from them back again to the heart and arteries, thus completing the circle, or circulation.

This wondrous stream, carelessly circulating, occupies the very centre of the vital organism, midway between the functions of Nutrition and the functions of excretion, feeding and stimulating the organs into activity, and removing from them all their useless material. In its torrent, upward of forty different substances are hurried along: it carries gases, it carries salts—it even carries metals and soups! Millions of organized cells float in its liquid; and of these cells, which by some are considered to die at every pulse of the heart, to be replaced by other millions. The iron which it washes onwards can be separated. Professor Beard used to exhibit a lump of it in his lecture-room—nay, one ingenious Frenchman has suggested that coins should be struck from the metal extracted from the blood of great men. Let no one suggest that we should wash our hands with the soup extracted from similar sources! From [Blackwood's Magazine.]

MOBILE.

A CORRESPONDENT of the True Witness, after a trip from New Orleans to Mobile, writes:

"Of fifty or sixty thousand passengers over this route not a life has been lost. This is a high commendation of the prudent and wise management of its affairs, by R. Geddes, Esq., the excellent agent, and principal proprietor of the boats. The passage between these two great Southern cities, distant about 170 miles, occupies fourteen or fifteen hours. Unhappily for the commercial interests of Mobile, the port of anchorage is thirty miles below the city, and large vessels are compelled to discharge and receive their freights by means of "steamlighters" a process inconvenient and expensive. The harbor is protected by a fort, and the coast is well supplied with United States governmental light-houses—blessed guides to the sons of the ocean, amid the darkness, the fog, and the storm! Unlike the New Orleans terminus, the mail-boats land immediately in Mobile.

"The city, with its wide regular streets, comes down to the water line, just at the point where the waters of the Alabama river meet and mingle with the briny flood of the bay. The city is pleasantly located. In many respects it is the queen city of the South. The population is more homogeneous than in New Orleans. A larger proportion of the citizens are "to the manor born," and more settled in their interests and attachments. Their homes and their hearts, as well as their business, are here. Hence there is more congeniality and harmony. The city, like the Roman mother, can say with just pride—the pride of affection—these are my jewels, my sons and daughters!

"Here, too, is true Southern hospitality and sociality. In a large proportionate degree, for a city, there is eminently cultivation and refinement. Schools and churches flourish. Religion and education go hand in hand. The population is twenty-five thousand."

"THE MOTHER OF WATERS."

LIEUT. HABERSHAM, in his letters from China to the Philadelphia Ledger, asserts that the Mississippi river, which we call the "Father of Waters," is not to be compared to the Yang-tse-Kiang river, to which he applies the name of "Mother of Waters." In proof of this he compares the width and volume of the two streams:

The Mississippi opposite New Orleans is not quite six hundred yards wide, with a mean depth of one hundred feet, and a mean velocity of nearly one and a half miles per hour. Thus a body of water one and a half miles long, six hundred yards wide, and one hundred feet thick is driven into the Gulf of Mexico every hour. A little more than one hundred miles from the mouth of the Yang-tse-Kiang (the Son of the Sea) is located the city of Kiang Yin. The river here is 1,900 yards wide, has an average depth of ninety-nine feet, and a mean velocity of two miles per hour. Thus we have, he remarks, a body of water two miles long, nineteen hundred yards wide, and ninety-nine feet thick hourly urged into the bosom of the Yellow Sea. Compare this volume with the first and it will be found to be almost double. Were the length of the great Chinese water course only known the comparison might be completed; but that cannot be until the interior of China is opened to the world. Its estimated length is three thousand three hundred miles. Lieut. Habersham estimates that the waters of the Yang-tse-Kiang carry along in suspension the remarkable quantity of about thirty-three and a third per cent. of sedimentary matter. According to this estimate, 1,985,336,000 cubic feet of mud is hourly transported to the sea by this river. It seems quite incredible, but as the earthly matter discharged by the Yang-tse-Kiang colors the waters at its mouth, giving to them the name of the Yellow Sea, besides forming immense flats, the amount must be very large. The Yang-tse-Kiang, however, bears no better comparison with the Amazon, than, according to Lieut. Habersham, the Mississippi does to the Chinese river. The Amazon, which is one thousand seven hundred and sixty nine miles in length in a direct line, or, including its windings, nearly four thousand miles, while four hundred miles from the Atlantic it is more than a mile in width, and has a velocity of three and a half miles per hour, and in mid-current no bottom is found with twenty fathoms or one hundred and twenty feet. This noble river, with its tributaries, is estimated to afford fifty thousand miles of inland navigation.

NEW ORLEANS TOW-BOAT COMPANY.

We copy the following letter—dated ship Stalwart, April 15th 1859, signed A. H. Lucas—from the New Orleans Commercial Bulletin. We have heard much fault found with the course pursued by the boats belonging to the Tow-boat Company, and sincerely hope they will speedily show these reports to be without foundation.

"I observe in your paper of the 14th inst. a statement that the steam-tug Conqueror, while assisting a ship on the Bar at the S. W. Pass, on the 12th instant, was run into by the ship Stalwart under full sail; and also, that the Stalwart was lying idle alongside of the ship Felicia, and the Stalwart is now leaky. The Stalwart was coming in under charge of a pilot; and at the time, and for two hours previous, had a signal set for a steam-tug, and although there were several tow-boats near by, doing nothing, none came to the ship till after the collision occurred. If I understand right, the tow-boats are intended to assist vessels visiting this port, and whenever a vessel has a signal set for steam, it is usually expected that if there are any tow-boats near by and idle, that they will come in answer to that signal, and render the services required, for which they are certainly well remunerated; but such does not appear to be the case at present, and the only alternative if a vessel wishes to reach New Orleans, appears to be to sail in over the bar with her signals unnoticed.

SING SONGS IN THE MORNING.

IT IS said by Xenophon that the Magi were first appointed under Cyrus, to sing songs to the gods "as soon as it was day." The statement is highly suggestive. Early rising has a claim upon the conscience of the Christian as the means of early devotion. Can we innocently choose to lie in unconscious slumber, when the return of light calls us to the remembrance of God? Have thoughts of His presence no rightful power to charm us from "leaden sleep?" As the day wears on, the press of business will allow us only broken communings with the Father of our spirits; but when the quiet morning first goes abroad on the earth, our "meditation on Him will be sweet," because no harsh interruption breaks in upon it. Is not this a duty? Is it not in equal measure a privilege? On no other supposition can we explain such passages as these in the Psalms, if that book be indeed a model for the devotions of the godly throughout all time: "My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee and will look up." "Awake psaltery and harp; I myself will awake early." "I cried unto Thee; save me, and I shall keep Thy testimonies. I prevented the dawning of the morning, and cried; I hope in thy word."

STILL UPWARD.—We learn from the London Watchman that the receipts of the Wesleyan Missionary Society for 1858, although not yet accurately ascertained, are known to be considerably in advance of the receipts of any previous year, falling short of six hundred and fifty thousand dollars. This noble income will enable the society to carry on with confidence the desired enlargement of the mission in China, India, and elsewhere, and will be the cause of devout thanksgiving and joy to the friends of the society throughout the world.

One-third of the seniors at Andover have devoted themselves to missions, which looks like a revival of the missionary spirit of other days.

IMPORTANT COMMERCIAL DECISION.

WE TAKE from the London Times the following decision, recently made in the Vice-Chancellor's court in that city, before Vice-Chancellor, Sir W. P. Wood:

MERTENS VS. HAIGH.—His Honor gave judgment in this case, which came upon a motion for an injunction to commit the defendants and a Mr. Bell, who acted as their agent, for a breach of an injunction.

The plaintiff was a merchant, carrying on business in New Orleans, in the cotton trade, and the defendants, Messrs. Haigh, who were cotton brokers at Liverpool, had acted as his agents in respect of dealings to a large extent. In December, 1857, upon the plaintiff's agreeing to give the defendants additional security to meet the depreciation in the value of the cotton then held by them as security for the balance due to him, they wrote to him pledging themselves to hold the cotton until the 20th of February, 1858, unless required by him to dispose of it at an earlier period. In February, 1858, the plaintiff was informed that the defendants intended to sell the cotton at the expiration of the time limited by their agreement. Wishing to obtain possession of the cotton, he offered to discharge the balance due from him. His application upon this subject having been acceded to, he gave them notice of his intention to apply for an injunction to restrain them from selling the cotton. He accordingly filed a bill, and obtained an injunction to that effect, ex parte, on the 19th of February, 1858. The defendants had notice to dissolve the injunction; but the cotton, which was stated to have been under the control of Messrs. Overend, Gurney & Co., as security for certain bills drawn by the plaintiff upon the defendants and discounted by Overend, Gurney & Co., had, notwithstanding the order of this court, been subsequently sold. The plaintiff had moved to commit the defendants and Bell for a breach of the injunction. The defendants stated that the cotton, as to the greater portion of it, was in the possession of Messrs. Overend, Gurney & Co., by their Liverpool agent, Bell, before notice of the injunction which was obtained had been received, and that the balance owing to them by the plaintiff was very heavy, and could not be adjusted as the cotton—which was of doubtful if not inferior value had been sold.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. T. Stevens were for the motion. Mr. Rolt and Mr. Eddis appeared for the defendants. Messrs. Haigh, and Mr. F. J. Wood for Bell.

The Vice-Chancellor, after stating the circumstances, said that the plaintiff, in obtaining the injunction, had set out the case plainly and clearly, and had not concealed any fact from the court. The defendants did not move to dissolve the injunction, and must be taken to have submitted to the justice of the order. They had, in May, 1858, put in an answer setting up a variety of things, but neither to Messrs. Gurney nor to the plaintiff had they behaved in a fair or ingenuous way. With respect to Bell there could be no doubt that he had committed a breach of the order in spirit, if not in the letter, by making himself as he had done a sort of instrument in the transaction. However strong a case of suspicion there might be against him, the Court could not go so far as upon mere suspicion to commit him, think being the nature of a criminal proceeding. As to the defendants, Edwin and Reginald Haigh, they had committed a plain breach of the injunction. He had never had to deal with a case which had caused him more anxiety. The defendants seemed to have been playing the same tricks with the Court that some merchants, he regretted to say, were in the habit of doing with their neighbors. They ought either to have obeyed the injunction or have stated their case plainly and simply, and applied to dissolve the injunction. His only reluctance as to actually committing them was that neither the plaintiff nor any one else would gain any benefit from such a course being taken. He had made up his mind, however, that if ever such a case came again before the Court, to make an example and commit the parties. In the present instance he should not commit the defendants, and the order would be that they undertake to abide by the order this Court might make as to damages occasioned to the plaintiff by the sale of the cotton; in the event of its appearing at the hearing, that the plaintiff did not authorise or acquiesce in the same being made over to Messrs. Gurney & Co., by way of security. A receiver would be appointed, and the defendants Reginald and Edwin Haigh, must pay all the cost of the present application.

LEONARD SCOTT & Co.'s REPUBLICATIONS.

SEVERAL of the late Quarterlies and Blackwood have been lying before us for two or three weeks, and we have been hoping to find time to read them, and to note their varied contents with some particularity. In this we are disappointed—partly for lack of time recently—partly for lack of room. We can only say that we do not believe so solid a mass of literature can be had in the language for $10 a year as these four Reviews and Blackwood contain. The Westminister Review must be read with full knowledge that it is the organ of the English Infidel Propaganda, and therefore is not to be commended to the general reader. But there is no subject in English literature, art, politics or religion [illegible] may say) that some one of these publications does not touch upon with more or less comprehensiveness, and they are essential to every highly cultivated book man. Mr. Morgan, is agent in New Orleans. For $10 per annum—The North British, Edinburg, London Quarterly and Westminister Reviews, and Blackwood's Magazine may be obtained.

"CAN'T FILL AN ORDER."

"I AM sorry," writes a preacher, "that you pretend to keep a Depository of Methodist books, and yet can't fill an order for a dozen hymn-books." So are we—but see what Dr. McFerrin says to the Agent when he complains that his orders to Nashville are not filled, "You ought to rejoice that we have once more a demand for our books so great as to push all our presses. As for perfect hymns we have not been able to get up with our orders. Of the 24mo Hymns we have none left. Of the 72mo I will send you to-morrow the last dozen we have in the House." He also speaks of the deficiency in some other books that have been largely ordered—and adds: "We will as soon as possible have a large supply of Hymns of all classes, but it will require a little time. Have patience." We will try: let the brethern also "have patience." [Southern Advocate.]

DR. NATHAN BANGS ON THE REVIVAL.—This venerable minister recently led the Fulton street prayer-meeting with very great acceptance, and to the gratification of the meeting. He stated, in the opening, that fifty-eight years ago, he believed God converted him—that fifty-seven years ago he entered the ministry, and in that time he had witnessed many powerful revivals of religion. But he believed he had never witnessed anything like the present. They had been of short duration, and local in their character and influence. But now it is not so. From every quarter of our land we hear glad tidings: and, also, from many portions of the Old World. In times past, in the very height of revivals, we held on to denominational differences, which had divided, and, perhaps, he might say, had disgraced the Church. But in this revival, one of the blessed characteristics of it is that every one loves his brother in Christ, of whatever name he may be. The old landmarks are moved away and all love, as being of one fold and one shephard.

BEQUEST.—The Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, acknowledges the receipt of one thousand dollars from the Executors of Joseph A. Nettles, deceased, of Jackson, Louisiana, amount of a bequest to the Missionary Society—four hundred dollars for Home, and six hundred dollars for Foreign Missions.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

We would recommend house-keepers, etc., who require wooden-ware, or such articles as L. Sawyer deals in, not to forget No. 70 Magazine-street; where Cotton weighers, etc., can see Dearborn's celebrated Balances.

Throw away your crutches, you who are rheumatic. Go to Wright's 21 and 151 Charters street, procure "Wadsworth's Liniment"—and be healed. See his adv.

See advertisements of S. A. Hubbs, in another column. The Great American Brick Machine will prove a great saving to those who need it; but all of those who have not Coleman's Metallic Farm Mill must be sadly in need of it.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

ARRIVAL OF THE EUROPA—ADVANCE IN COTTON.

British Ministry Defeated.

Prospects of the Continuance of Peace Discouraging.

New York, April 18.—The Cunard steamship Europa, arrived this morning with advices from London and Liverpool three days later than received by the City of Baltimore.

Cotton Market.

Liverpool, April 2.—The sales of Cotton during the week ending on Friday amounted to 63,200 bales. The sales on Friday 8,000 bales, at the following quotations: Fair—Orleans, 7¾; Mobile, 7¾; Uplands, 7¾; Middling—Orleans, 7¾; Mobile, 7¾; Uplands, 7¼d. The stock of Cotton at Liverpool is 327,000 bales, of which 292,500 are American. Some circulars say there is an advance of 1-16 to ⅛d. on some qualities of Cotton, and greater firmness generally. Holders are offering their stocks freely, but show no disposition to press sales.

Havre, April 1.—The Cotton market closed firm, and prices are advanced 1 to 2f. during the week. The sales of the week sum up 14,000 bales. The stock of Cotton in Havre is 147,000 bales, mostly American. Orleans tres ordinaire closed at 107f. Orleans bas 102f. The demand has been active during the week.

Political Intelligence.

Liverpool, April 2.—The latest phase of political intelligence from the Continent, is rather discouraging as to the prospects of an amicable settlement of the Italian question.

Austria has refused to accede to the proposition of the other great powers, to assemble a Congress at Baden, for the purpose of adjusting the existing difficulties between France and Austria.

Nothing decisive has transpired in regard to the time and place of holding the Peace Congress, which is still spoken of as certain to be convoked.

In the British Parliament the Ministerial Reform Bill has been pressed to a vote, and the Ministry were defeated by a thirty-nine majority.

The Ministry had not resigned, but it was expected they would do so.

The Irish Sedition Trials.

Liverpool, April 2.—The Irish sedition trials at Tralee resulted in the conviction and sentence of the prisoners to ten years penal servitude.

The trial of those arrested on the same charge at Belfast, ceased, had been concluded.

The jury disagreed, and were locked up till they should come to some agreement on a verdict.

The Peace Congress.

France has consented to leave the choice of the locality of the Peace Congress to Austria.

Piedmont is to be admitted to the Congress on the same footing with that of the other Italian States.

Count Cavour Secured his Point.

Count Cavour, the Sardinian Prime minister, had returned to Turin from Paris; and it is said that he has secured the object he had in view in visiting Napoleon.

Military Preparations.

The military preparations of France and Austria are continued with apparently the same warlike aspect.

DOMESTIC.

Our Government in its True Position.

The recognition by our Minister to Mexico of the Government of Juarez, is a refreshing instance of vigor and promptitude in the right direction, which stands out in bold relief from the general tameness and indecision of our diplomacy for some years past.

Mr. McLane deserves a large share of the credit and commendation due to this act. His instructions gave him a wide discretion in the matter. He deserves high praise for acting on the spirit, more than on the letter of the same. He has, too, recognized, as our ministers abroad too rarely do, the existence of a universal sentiment among our people in favor of the success of the Liberal and Republican party; an active sympathy in behalf of Juarez and his cause: and the obligation upon the part of our Government to oppose and defeat the flagrant efforts of the European Powers to control the destinies of Mexico.

We have little doubt that the results of this course will be mighty favourable to our interests, as they tend to give our Republic a higher and more honourable position in the diplomacy of the world than it has heretofore occupied.

Besides their claims on the score of congenial political principles and objects, and hostility to all European influence in the affairs of the States of this Continent, and an inflexible opposition to all combination of Church and State—the Government of Juarez had, in various ways, manifested its kindly and generous feelings towards our Government and people, which demand like return on our part.

Among other evidences of this feeling was the concession to the American Tehauntepec Company of certain enlargements and modifications of their franchises, which are very materiel to the success and furtherance of that enterprise. Fortunately for the appearance of this affair, these concessions were made before Mr. McLane had arrived at Vera Cruz; and there could not therefore be any auspicion of collusion or compromise on that subject.

The decree of Juarez making these concessions to the Tehauntepec Company was granted and signed on the 27th of March, and Mr. McLane did not reach Vera Cruz until the 1st of April, and did not present his credentials to Juarez until the 8th of April. It was impossible for any communication to have been had between Juarez and our Minister from the date of the letter's appointment until the granting of the decree in favor of the Tehauntepec Company. We state these facts in order that the prompt, manly and graceful act of Mr. McLane may not be nullied by any imputation of bargain, concert or compromise; but that it may appear, as it really was, a handsome, gallant, liberal and wise manifestation and expression of the prevalent sentiment and feeling of our people and of the true policy of our Government. Four Days Later from California.

St. Louis, April 10.—The overland California mail has arrived here with advices from San Francisco to the 25th ult.

The advices from the mining districts of California and British Columbia were favorable.

Passengers by the mail coach report a family of nine persons had been massacred by the Caddo Indians in the vicinity of Cooper Camp, Texas.

The Southeren Pacific Railroad.

We have not thought it worth while to keep the run of the quarrels between the two Companies and the state of Texas about the Southern Pacific Railroad, as, after the Old Company was "sold out," we concluded that there would be an endless round of litigation that would effectually stop any further progress upon the work. We see it stated in the Marshall papers that the state suit against the Company for the forfeiture of its charter has been decided in favor of the Company; and that the difficulties between the Old and the New Companies have been amicably end finally compromised to the mutual satisfaction of all concerned. We devoutly trust that this may turn out to be so, and that the work upon the road may now commence again and go on uninterruptedly. We take back not one jot or tittle of any thing we have ever said as to the transcendant importance of this great enterprise, but on the contrary re-assert it all, with increased emphasis.

Our cotemporary, the Picayune, we observe, regards the settlement of all the difficulties as final, and the news as official.

What measures the Company will now take to recommence and permanently carry on the work of building the road, we do not know. We trust that they may be such as will secure the great object in view with certainty. We were among the first and warmest advocates of the road, and abate not an iota of the interest which we felt in its construction. We hope the end of disagreements, conventions and resolutions without action, has at last been reached.

Cuban Telegraph.

We learn from Savannah, Ga., that Mr. C. C. Walden, the manager and superintendent of the Cuban Telegraph Company, is now in that city, pushing forward as rapidly as possible the line of land telegraph which, in connection with the submarine cable, is shortly to unite us with the Island of Cuba.

The land line is from Savannah along the Savannah and Gulf Railroad, about fifty miles, thence South, to the road from Fernandina to Cedar Keys, and from the latter place by cable to Key West, and thence to Havana.

The line from Savannah to Fernandina is now completed, and from the capital invested, and the known energy of the parties interested in the enterprise, there is every reason to believe that the entire work will be completed without delay.

The history of this important enterprise has been one of silent and rapid progress, and its present state of advancement, unheralded by the puffings which characterized the Atlantic cable, is good evidence that Mr. Walden means to accomplish without delay the object he has undertaken, and that the advantages of direct telegraphic communication with the Island of Cuba will be speedily offered to the public. [Delta.]

Col. Mata, Minister from Mexico.

Col. Mata, who has just received intelligence from Washington of his recognition as Minister from Mexico, is a gentleman of great accomplishment and very high character. In the war between the United States and Mexico, he commanded as Lieutenant-Colonel in the army of his country and greatly distinguished himself in the battle of Cerro Gordo, where he was taken prisoner by our troops, and sent to this city. During his sojourn here, and while a prisoner in charge of some of our officers, Colonel Mata created a most favorable impression upon all with whom he associated. He is a fine scholar, speaks English with great ease, is a warm admirer of our country and institutions, and is a sincere patriot and lover of his own country.

It is a remarkable coincidence, that both of the last two ministers from Mexico to the United States should have made their first acquaintance with our people, as prisoners of war to our army. Robles was in the list of the captives at Vera Cruz, and Mata was made prisoner at Cerro Gordo. We imagine that the two ministers will be found very different in their characteristics. Robles, though possessing many excellent traits, and some talent, has an ambition to figure as a political intriguant and cunning diplomatist. Mata, on the other hand, bears himself always like a high-toned gentleman, scholar, and republican. The one has met the fate which sooner or later awaits all who enter upon the devious ways of political intrigue, of mere partizanship, without principle or patriotism. He has stooped to the infinite degradation of playing parasite and flatterer to that wretchedly puny specimen of a Mexican hero, Miramon, and is now the sharer of the infamy and misfortune, as he hoped to be of the glory and prosperity of that upstart. Mata, on the other hand, enters upon a career which promises to be one of distinction and patriotic usefulness to his country, under auspices of the most inspiring and elevating character.

LOCAL.

Buildings Improvements.

We never knew so many buildings in process of erection at one time in New Orleans as may now be seen. In whatever direction we turn, buildings, either just beginning or at a more advanced stage, meet the eye. Many, most of them in fact, are private residences. They are generally, too, houses of the larger and more expensive class. Some of them are indeed worthy to be designated as palatial, and will be ornaments to the localities where they are situated, as well as comfortable and delightful homes to their owners. So great is the demand for building materials, lumber, bricks, etc., which this home-creating spirit has brought about, that prices have of late very materially advanced. The prices of some materials, we understand, have increased from thirty to fifty per cent since the beginning of the year. Real estate, also, is higher than it has been for a long time. The M'Donogh property brought considerably more than its appraisement.

All this is suggestive and significant with regard to our local affairs. While it shows that pestilence and flood, fire and disorder have not been able to crush us, that our recuperative energies are almost matchless, and possess evidently the strength of Titans; this state of things brings along with it responsibilities of much weight, and requires no little faithfulness, wisdom, promptitude and sagacity on the part of our municipal authorities to turn it to the best account. Various important considerations go to show that the present is an interesting era in our local history. There is now a "tide in our affairs" which may be turned greatly to our advantage and be made to "lead on to fortune." [Bulletin.]

The South-Western Line of Railroads.

The Nashville News says: The Railroad connections from Washington to New Orleans, by way of Lynchburg, Chattanooga, and Grand Junction, are now in such a state of forwardness that no doubt exists of the completion of the remaining links before the wet weather of the ensuing fall sets in. be most important of these connections, because the only one which is now to be made by stage coaches, is the Mississippi Central road, between Canton and Water Valley. About seventy miles of track are yet to be laid on this road. The iron for this has been purchased and most of it delivered; the track is nearly graded, and it will be finished before the first of October. In the mean time, the stage portion of the route will be rapidly superseded by rails; and by the first of August it is estimated that no more than twenty-five miles will remain unfinished. By that time also, the Orange and Alexandria road will be completed to Lynchburg. The Cleveland and Chattanooga road will, we are assured, be finished by the first of June next. They are the only incomplete links in that whole route.

The distance from New Orleans to New York by this route is fifteen hundred miles. A twenty miles an hour schedule would accomplish the trip between those two cities in seventy-five hours. We are assured that such a schedule will be rue. But allowing nine hours for meals and change of cars, the time from New York to New Orleans cannot exceed three and a half days. The same schedule will place Nashville within about two days of New York, and within a day and a half of Washington.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Christian Indians.

A second opportunity was enjoyed by those of the congregation of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Ninth street, who were present on Monday evening, of uniting in worship in the social prayer meeting with a number of the Christian Indians from the West and North-west, now on a visit to Washington on the business of their respective tribes. These Indians were not only strangers to the congregation, but generally strangers to each other, and members of different Christian churches; yet they spoke of the religion of Christ as the source of their enlightenment and happiness, and the basis of their hopes. One who was with them, Rev. Mr Chamberlain, said he had come from Oregon to plead the cause of the oppressed Indian before the President. "I gave my pocket Bible to the old chief," he said, "as a token of my promise that I would come and see the President and place my hand upon his heart; and that if it should beat warmly towards the red men, I would return to them with the good news. If I shall not return," he added, "they will know that that heart is not kind toward them."

This gentlemun spoke warmly of the honesty and sincerity of the Christian Indians, and the steadfastness of their simple faith. Mr. Jones, of Kansas, an educated Indian, and a member of the Baptist Church, spoke at length and very instructively of the experience of his life among his brethren of the forests, and of the new life and source of joy and comfort opened to them when they are taught to read the Bible, and made to understand its pleasing revelations. Mr. Woodman, an Indian from the North, and a member of the Methodist Church, was diffident and reluctant to arise. He said he had no learning but the learning of his heart. He loved to meet the white men who pray. He had been taught to pray by the good white men who had come to his people in the name of Christ, and who had given them the Bible, which their children were learning to read. The Indian believed with all his heart and loved the Christian Religion. The Indian did not stay away from the place of prayer. The men and the women and the children all went to the meetings, and did not mind the rain; and when any were sick they asked the people to come to them and pray. He hoped his hearers would excuse him if he should speak plainly to them. The white man were not all good and kind. Some of them had taught the Indian, and the Indian could pray in his own language, and he could sing in his own language, and he could preach in his own language. When the Indian swears, he has to borrow the language of the white man. The white man also gives him fire drink, which has killed thousands and millions. The white man also takes his land. When the Indian sees that religion is good, he asks for more religion; but the white men cries "more land, more land!" "More religion," we say; he says "more land!" And he takes our land, and makes us move away before him. By-and-by he will drive us to the rocky mountains; then the wind will blow us into the sea, and the sea will cover us, and we shall find a home in heaven, and the white man shall have all the land.

These Indians all appeared to be well pleased with the interest so manifestly evinced in their history and welfare; and they were assured by Dr. Smith, the pastor, and by a gentleman who arose in the congregation that their visit would be long remembered, and that the words they had spoken were good, and should be repeated among all the people when their Indian friends should have gone towards their distant homes.

A River of Fire.

The Lava Stream Near Kauwaihae.—Waimea, Hawaii, February 4.—Had I the ability, I should like to give a description of the present volcanic erruption; but I am fearful of a failure should the attempt be made. When one has seen the real thing itself, there is no room for the play of the imagination or poetry. You may exhaust language of its most expressive and descriptive terms, and yet fail to reach the reality. I shall attempt no more than to give a few facts. On Sabbath, Jan. 23, volcanic smoke was seen gathering on Mauna Loa.

In the evening the mountain presented a grand and yet fearful spectacle. Two streams of fire were issuing from two different sources, and flowing, apparently, in two different directions. The whole region, earth and heaven, was lighted up, and even the interior of our houses received the lurid volcanic light direct from its source. In the morning of the second day, we could discern where the eruptions were. One appeared to be very near the top of the mountain, but its stream and smoke soon after disappeared. The other was on the North side, further below the top, and was sending out its fires in a North-westerly direction.

On the second and third nights, the dense smoke and clouds prevented us from having a fair view of Pele's doings; but on the four following nights we had a view—such a scene! It seemed as though the eye could never weary in gazing at it. The burning crater seemed to be constantly enlarging and throwing up its volumes of liquid fire above the mouth of the crater—I will not venture to say how high—and the fiery stream rolled onward and onward, still adding grandeur and terror as it proceeded, till, on the morning of the 31st, about sunrise, the stream was compelled, though reluctantly, to stop, by meeting the waters of the ocean. Even then its restless and opposing energy carried it on some distance into the sea.

The poor inhabitants of Waiea hill, the name of the village where the fire reached the ocean, were aroused at the midnight hour by the hissing and roaring of the approaching fire, and had but just time to save themselves. Some of the houses of the Inland portion of the village were partly surrounded before the inmates were aware of their danger. Waaniuhili is near the Northen boundary of North Kona, and about twelve or fourteen miles from Kawaihae. It is of course all destroyed, and its pleasant little harbor filled with lava. The volcanic stream was one mile wide or more in some places, and much less in others. It crossed the Kona road and interrupted the mail communication. The whole distance of the flow from the crater to sea is some forty miles.

The Rothschilds Bridal Dinner.

The Paris correspondent of the Literary Gazette says:

"A great event in the bour mondr of this place, has been the Rothschilds marriage. The magnificence was beyond all description, and it would appear that splendors, vieing with those recounted in the Arabine Nights were lavished upon ee entertainment to which nobody was ndmitted. I mean the dinner given after the nuptial ceremony, and at which some sixty or seventy Rothschilds only were present. As no one but the family were present at this fanction—as the Spaniards entitle their bull-fights and other amusements—of course the feminine public curiosity is immensurably excited by it, and every young male Rothschild has been cross-examined by the fair ladies of Paris ever since, in order that they may arrive at an approximate knowledge of the festive scene. It appears that all the plete of all the houses of Rothschilds nearly was forthcoming for this banquet; at least the London chief sent his dinner-service over to his cousin of Paris, and the entire changes of his more than three-score guests were made in silver and silver-gilt plates, dishes, everything was of the precious metals as at the royal tables, only at dessert was perceived the priceless service of old Sevres, belonging to the Paris patersamilias, and whereof each plete represents somewhere about a king's ransom.

As to the viands on the table, they came from every country and every clime; there were swallows' nests from China, sterlets (a fish of excessive high price in Russia, of the size of salmon, and of fat, orsege-colored flesh) from Russia, reed birds and canvass back ducks from America, bustards from Spain, pheasants from Bohemia, entrees of peacock's brains, fillets of Bufalo hump, and, as one of my lady informents declares, salmis of Brazilian perrots! Every salt or fresh water has yielded up its fish; every moor marsh and forest its fowl; every hot-bed, heated by fire or the sun, its fruit; and every grape that ever hung eny where its wine. As to the flowers with which the table and the dining-room were ornamented, it is affirmed that there were 1500 pounds worth, (I mean £1500 English!) All the windows were covered with trellis work, over which were framed the choicest creeping plants of the tropics, shedding their luscious perfumes all round. If the repast was worthy of an emperor of a century ago, the tribe of Rothschild seems to have been worthy of it, and to have done it due honor. In the first place, it is affirmed that the ladies present wore upon their persons between twenty and thirty millions of francs' worth of jawels, and, in the way of doing honor to the benquet those who partood of it sat at the table from half-past six to midnight!"

COMMERCIAL.

Tuesday Evening, April 10, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New-Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 16th inst.: The past week has been a period of considerable activity in some of our leading staples, the course of the freight and exchange markets having been favorable to accelerated movements. It will be seen that Cotton has met with a good demand at improved prices, and that Tobacco has moved off more freely than at any previous period since the opening of the season, while Sugar and Molasses have attracted but a moderate demand, with reduced rates for the former article. In the various articles of Western Produce dullness generally prevails, the transactions being mainly confined to limited parcels for the home demand.

The river has risen very near to high-water mark.

COTTON.—In this market a good degree of activity prevailed in the early part of the week, the sales of the first three days summing up 38,000 bales, of which 17,000 bales were disposed of on Tuesday, and quotations advanced ¼ to ⅛c. for the Middling and lower grades. On Wednesday the inquiry was again very fair, but with a reduced supply on sale and very full prices claimed the business fell off to about 8500 bales, and under similar circumstances the sales of Thursday were confined to about 7000 bales. On Friday the Europa's advices, three days later, were considered about due, and there was but a limited attendance of buyers, with sales of only about 3000 bales; making a total for the past three days of 18,500 bales; and for the whole week of 56,500 bales; the receipts, during same period, 19,822; and the exports, 73,972 bales. Stock, in Presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 15th inst. 318,224 bales. With respect to prices, we have already noted an advance of ¼ to ⅛c. in the early part of the week, and since then, with favorable exchanges and a further decline in freights, sellers have obtained a further advantage to the extent of about ¼ to ⅛c; making the advance during the week ½ to ⅝c. per pound.

Of the stock on hand Sept. 1, the amount unsold is estimated at	bales 10,000
Receipts since September 1	1,670,358
Making a supply of	1,680,358
Reported sales	1,593,800
Forwarded, unsold, say	10,000
Burned, about	15,000—1,618,800
Apparent stock	61,558

FREIGHTS.—We have no material change to report in the European freight market since our last publication. There has been rather more activity exhibited, however, than in the first of the week, and, it may be said, perhaps, that the market is a little firmer. We notice several ships taken for Liverpool at ⅝d. for Cotton, and that is now the established rate, though it was difficult to obtain consignments at these figures yesterday. Two ships have been taken for Havre at ¼ cent for Cotton, one bark for Fleetwood at 7-16d., and a ship for Europe on private terms. A Bremen ship has also been laid on for Bremen a 42s. 6d. for Tobacco. In Coastwise freights there is still but a very limited business doing. The rates for Cottou to New-York and Boston are lower, but there is no other quotable change.

Centenary College of Louisiana.

TO THE PUBLIC:—The undersigned, a quorum of the Executive Committee of Centenary College of Louisiana, would state that the Rev. VERNON H. JOHNSON, a member of the Mississippi Conference, is our agent for the College—to raise funds for building and endowment purposes—and that we cordially commend him, and the cause he represents, to the friends of Education and the public generally.

The Board of Trustees, have recently erected a large building, for College purposes, at a cost of 00,000; upon which a heavy balance remains unpaid. They wish to pay this debt, and to raise the endowment fund to at least $100,000. They know that the friends of education are able to do this, and they believe they are willing, and only wait the opportunity. Under these considerations, our Agent has gone forth; and, from his present success, we feel confident that the work will be done speedily. Friends desiring to know our plan or to co-operate with us, can communicate with the Agent, Rev. V. N. Johnson, Cayuga Mississippi; or with John C. Miller, Jackson, La.

A Newspaper Wanted.—A correspondent from Washington county, Mississippi, writes that a newspaper, is much needed in that country, and that any one starting one there can make it profitable, as neither of the adjoining counties has a paper, and there is much legal advertising to be done in each, all of which could be had by a paper published in Washington county, together with a sufficient number of subscribers.

The above we clip from an exchange, for the purpose of saying that the New Orleans Christian Advocate office has for sale all the type and other materials necessary for the establishment of such a paper, at a low price. Apply soon.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

The Song of Seventy.—BY M. F. TUPPER.

I am not old, I cannot be old,
Though threescore years and ten
Have wasted away like a tale that is told,
The lives of other men.

I am not old; though friends and foes
Alike have gone to their graves,
And left me alone to my joys or my woes,
As a rock in the midst of the waves.

I am not old, I cannot be old,
Though tottering, wrinkled and gray;
Though my eyes are dim, and my marrow is cold,
Call me not old to-day.

For, early memories round me throng,
Old times, and manners and men,
As I look behind on my journey so long,
Of threescore years and ten.

I look behind and am once more young,
Buoyant, and brave, and bold,
And my heart can sing, as of yore it sung,
Before they called me old.

I do not see her—the old with there—
Shriveled, and haggard, and gray,
But I look on her blooming, and soft, and fair,
As she was on her wedding day.

I do not see you, daughters and sons,
In the likeness of women and men,
But I kiss you now as I kissed you once,
My fond little children then.

And, as my grandson rides on my knee,
Or, plays with his hoop or kite,
I can well recollect I was merry as he—
The bright-eyed little wight!

'Tis not long since, it cannot be long,
My years so soon were spent,
Since I was a boy, both straight and strong,
Yet now I am feeble and bent.

A dream, a dream, it is all a dream!
A strange, sad dream, good sooth;
For old as I am, and old as I seem,
My heart is full of youth.

Eye hath not seen, tongue hath not told,
And ear hath not heard it sung,
How buoyant and bold, though it seem to grow old,
Is the heart, for ever young.

For ever young, though life's old age,
Hath every nerve unstrung;
The heart, the heart is a heritage
That keeps the old man young!

The Simple Secret.

Twenty clerks in a store. Twenty "hands" in a printing-office. Twenty apprentices in a ship-yard. Twenty young men about a village. All want to get on in the world, and all expect to do so. One of the clerks will rise to be a partner and make a fortune. One of the compositors will own a newspaper and become an influential and prosperous citizen. One of the apprentices will come to be a master builder. One of the young villagers will get a handsome farm and live like a patriarch. But which is destined to be the lucky individual? Lucky? There is no luck about it. The thing is almost as certain as the Rule of Three. The young fellow who will distance his competitors is he who masters his business, who preserves his integrity, who lives cleanly and purely, who never gets into debt, who gains friends by deserving them, and puts his money into the savings-bank. There are some ways to fortune that look shorter than this old dusty highway. But the staunch men of the community, the men who achieve something really worth having, good fortune, good name, and a serene old age, all go this road.

Round Shoulders.

If a catalogue of our national sins be ever completed, it should embrace those of having round shoulders, so called. We are very largely a nation of stoopers, from the farmer in his field thrown to the advocate at his table. There is not the slightest necessity for this, and it is ungainly as it is unhealthy. Boys who have a tendency to "lopp" should be made to straighten themselves, and if kind counsel does not bring them to their perpendiculars, ridicule should be resorted to and perseavered in until the thing is done. There is probably not more than one pair of stooping shoulders in a hundred, which stoop unavoidably. Free exercise of all the muscles of the chest, back and abdomen, in the erect position, will cure the evil. Walking has no tendency to do this.

A Beautiful Comparison.

The sun does not shine for a few trees and flowers, but for the world's joy. The lonely pine on the mountain-top waves its sombre boughs and cries, "Thou art my sun." And the little violet lifts up its cup of bliss and whispers with its perfumed breath, "Thou art my sun."

So God sits in heaven, not for a favored few, but for the universe of life, and there is no creature so poor or so low, that he may not look up with childlike confidence, and say, "My Father, thou art mine."

Humorous.

THE POPE AND THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Queen's eldest son has been cruising about as midshipman on a man-of-war in the Mediterranean, and the fears of Protestant England were alarmed at the report that he intended visiting Rome, and might see the Pope himself. If the following account be true, he faced St. Peter's successor right well. We copy from the London Watchman, which copied from the Press, and our readers may take it for fun or fact, or both:

PIO NONO.—Good morning your Royal Highness; I am delighted to see a scion of the royal family of England here.

PRINCE OF WALES.—I thank you for your courtesy and attention. This is an interesting capital. Its suggestive power is overwhelming. Here is the Flavian Amphitheatre, begun by Vespasian. Here are altars built in the days of Constantine. There are the stones of the Appian way, once trodden by re-

PIO NONO.—Your education does credit to your royal mother. You have a touch of the esthetic about you wonderful for an Anglo-Saxon.

PRINCE OF WALES.—One cannot help being poetic as well as esthetic here. I have seen the arch of Titus, the forum, the Tarpeian rock, and the Capitoline, the Sabine hills, Frascati and Tusculum. I can almost feel here the force of Lord Palmerston's Civis Romanus.

PIO NONO.—Bad fellow, that old Palmerston—headstrong, irreverent, no sense of veneration: no respect for his ecclesiastical superiors whatever.

PRINCE OF WALES.—Curious contrasts in this city. I noticed, over the altar of St. John Lateran, a list of funny articles—the arm of Helen the mother of Constantine, a finger of St. Catherine, the brain of St. Vincent of Paul, the head of Zacharias, father of John the Baptist. In the Church of the Holy Cross, the finger of St. Thomas and the hair of the Virgin Mary. I don't understand your denying Christian burial to those human remains. Did the original proprietors commit some great crime?

PIO NONO.—Your religious education is scarcely complete. There are our holy relics of the blessed saints for our pious veneration.

PRINCE OF WALES.—You don't mean to say so! Have you any sanitary commissioners in Rome?

PIO NONO.—I am myself the sole sanitary commissioner. But I have double the duties yours have. I have to clean consciences as well as sinners and the Tiber—the former I assure you the more arduous affair. But I see you are much in need of my blessing. Shall I request the Superior of the order of the Oratorio to give your Royal Highness a little religious instruction?

PRINCE OF WALES.—Thank you. But I must respectfully decline. My mother told me to have nothing to do with Popery and Jesuitism."

PIO NONO.—Pity no right royal a lady should be so adverse to the Church of the Holy Church. May the Blessed Virgin and all the saints enlighten her!

PRINCE OF WALES.—Your Holiness is not aware, perhaps, that the Queen of England, at her coronation, and in the presence of her peers and people, took a solemn oath of abjuration of your faith and supremacy, and—pardon a young Protestant—your superstitions.

PIO NONO.—Crossing himself, and invoking countless saints and unknown in rapid succession—Our heart is deeply afflicted, and our spirit is bowed down with grief, at the very remembrance of the Reformation, that accursed catastrophe which led us wealthy England at a blow.

PRINCE OF WALES.—You are not aware that my father is descended of the great Hester who patronized Martin Luther. I am a Protestant by succession, generation, education, and, I trust, conviction also.

PIO NONO.—Would you like a nice Morocco-bound Missal to enable you to assist at mass?

PRINCE OF WALES.—Thank you, the old wine is best. I have a wife and a Prayer-book, the gifts of my good mother. In Rome I mean to do as an Englishman should; not as Rome does. Wherefore is the Protestant chapel?

PIO NONO.—It is an old stable outside the walls of the Holy City. It would be dangerous and unesthetic to suffer it inside.

PRINCE OF WALES.—This is toleration in your meridian, I suppose. You build Cathedrals and chapels in England, and nobody interferes. But Protestant chapels in Rome are interdicted and forbidden. Your city is like the Irishman's castle—all the reciprocity is on one side.

PIO NONO.—Would your Royal Highness like to see high mass at St. Peter's? To oblige you I will myself officiate, and your quondam parson, Archdeacon Manning, who is just arrived, will take part. You have no notion of the splendor. There is nothing like it in London. By doing so you will be thought liberal and above vulgar prejudices.

PRINCE OF WALES.—Latitudinarian, you mean. But (opening his pocket Prayer-book, and turning to the Thirty-nine Articles, while the Pope looks daggers) I find one of the Articles of my Prayer-book, and of that Church of which I hope, for a very distant day, I shall be head, says, "The mass is a blasphemous fable and a dangerous deceit." How can I get over this, even were I so disposed?

PIO NONO.—Turning, and addressing the Major-dome—Sprinkle some holy water here, and bring smelling-salts, or a bone of St. Agatha.

The Cardinals standing by, fletteriog and stroking their ecclesiastical corporations, unanimously repeat the words of the Council of Trent; "Anathema Heretious! Anathema! Anathema!"

PIO NONO.—Resuming his blandest and silliest looks—Dr. Newman and Archdeacon Manning, and at least a hundred clergymen who once subscribed that shockingly illiberal saying, received grace from the Blessed Virgin, and gut over it. Let me recommend to your Royal Highness this beautiful string of beads that I have blessed. Repeat so many Aves and so many Paternosters, and in a few days——

PRINCE OF WALES.—Thank yoe. I do not use beads or windmills, or any other ecclesiastical toys, and as for praying to the Virgin Mary, I never think of it. I never do things at second hand. I invariably go to head quarters.

PIO NONO.—I fear you are rather prejudiced.

PRINCE OF WALES.—Your Holiness appears tolerably happy. I have heard deplorable accounts of your condition. I do not mean in 1849, but in this year, 1859.

PIO NONO.—My personal condition is better than the Cardinals, one of whom hopes to succeed me. Bet my political state, to be candid, is very uncomfortable. If I keep neutral between Austria and France—which I assure you is a very difficult business—these two powers quarrel, and my subjects explode. Forthwith I am cast upon the Austrian bayonets. Another complication occurs, and I am pitched upon the French bayonets, and of the two seats I do not know which is the least comfortable. If I dismiss them, like Actaeon I am devoured by my own dogs—I mean, children. If I retain either, I am doomed to ceaseless penance—a penance as severe as if all the sins of Hildebrand, and Alexander VI., and the Borgias, were added to my own. In fact, I am in purgatory on earth.

PRINCE OF WALES.—I feel very sincerely for you. I wish I could relieve you.

PIO NONO.—Could you not prevail on your royal mother to send me a battalion of my Irish children in my extremity? Paul Cullen, whom I have just made a Cardinal, is here; and he tells me that they would gladly fight for me.

PRINCE OF WALES.—Why, your Holiness, the Irish are all becoming Protestant, and no one has so helped on this result as Paul Cullen, if I may except John M'Hale. My mother has no particular desire to keep up your rickety establishment, wisely thinking that a religion that is without any good fruits is better without any living representatives. But I assure you that I feel for you. But don't you frequently write in your Bulls, that "the gates of hell will not prevail against you?"

PIO NONO.—That's very true. I could manage "the gates of hell," if I could only dispense with the bayonets of Vienna and Paris, and keep down revolution in Rome. I have no dread of a future purgatory, but I feel my present one insufferable. Ave Maria.

PRINCE OF WALES.—When I return to London I will state the facts of your case quoque ipse miserrima vidi. But Lord Derby is deep and cautious. Lord Palmerston would rather send a brigade of Guards to sweep you out. Lord John Russell is worse than either, for he proposes to let you alone.

PIO NONO.—Lasciate ogni speranza voi ch'intrate. Dante's purgatory was cool and comfortable beside mine. Will your Royal Highness breakfast with me to-morrow? I want to have a chat with your about my Pro-Consul in England, Cardinal Wiseman.

PRINCE OF WALES.—With pleasure.

His Royal Highness retires.—Holy water is sprinkled where he stood, incense is burned, and the Cardinals look unutterable things, and Pio Nono takes his semi-siesta, wishing heretics no hotter nook in purgatory than that which he inhabits.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

THE TURKISH BRIDE'S LAMENT.—BY AN ENGLISH LADY.

I wish I were a flower to fade
Beneath this glowing sky,
Unconscious when my charms decayed
To droop my head and die.

My proud lord loves to call me still
The beauty of his soul,
But much I fear that love will cease
Ere many summers roll;

Then for a fairer, I shall be Forgotten like the dead,
And a'en my memory cast away
Like flowers whose odor's shed.

He loves me for my bright dark eye,
And for my graceful form;
He recks not of the thoughts that lie
Hid in this bosom warm.

He gives me gems to deck my hair,
And chains of costly art,
And many a silken garment fair—
But nothing for my heart.

He loves me like his Arab horse,
Or like his jeweled blade;
I am his pride, but not the rest
Where all his cares are laid.

My little slave from Algiers tells
That in the Christians' land,
The women are not there like me,
A scorned and childish band.

She tells me that one true wife lives
The love of one fond heart,
And that no meaner power than death,
Those happy souls can part.

And though within the Christian's heaven
No dark-eyed Houries shine,
Yet 'mongst the blessed ones forgiven,
Are women's souls like mine.

Now often as my fingers trace
The embroidery rich and gay,
I wish I were a Christian's wife,
In countries far away.

DR. HALL'S Journal of Health, gives the following

ADVICE TO CONSUMPTIVE PERSONS,

Eat all you can digest, and exercise a great deal in the open air, to convert what you eat into pure healthy blood. Do not be afraid of out-door air day or night. Do not be afraid of sudden changes in the weather; let no change, hot or cold, keep you in-doors. If it is rainy weather, the more need of your going out, as you eat as much upon a rainy day as upon a clear day; and if you exercise less, that much more remains in the system of what ought to be thrown off by exercise, and some ill-result, some consequent symptom of ill-feeling is the certain issue. If it is cold out of doors, do not muffle your eyes, nose and mouth in furs, veils, woolen-comforters, and the like; nature has supplied you with the best muffler, the best inhaling regulator—that is two lips; shut them before you step out of a warm room into the cold air, and keep them shut until you have walked a few rods briskly, and quickened the circulation a little; walk fast enough to keep off a feeling of chilliness, and taking cold will be impossible. What are the facts of the case? Look at a railway conductor going out of the hot air into the piercing cold air of winter and in again, every five or ten minutes, and yet they do not take cold oftener than others; you will scarcely find a consumptive person in a thousand of them.

It is wonderful how afraid consumptive people are of cold air, the very thing that would cure them—the only obstacle to a cure being that they do not get enough of it, especially if it is cold, when it is known that the colder the purer it must be; yet if people cannot go to a hotter climate, they will make an artificial one, and imprison themselves a whole winter in a room with a temperature not varying ten degrees in six months. All such people die, and yet we follow in their footsteps. If I were seriously ill of consumption, I would live out of doors day and night, except it were raining or mid-winter; then I would sleep in an unplastered log house.

GIVE US WOMEN NOT FEMALES.

If there is one thing that ought to be considered deliberately ungallant and insulting to the better half of the race, it is the use of the word "female" for "woman." The papers said the other day that, when Mrs. Sickles made her confession to her husband, there were two females present. But were they the cat and canary bird, or pet poodlee, or what sort of females? The sex is as numerous as the catalogue of animated nature. So also in the Stephen's murder trial in New York, one of the witnesses testified to seeing two females in the room with Mrs. Stephens on a certain occasion, and the doctor who made a post mortem examination of Mrs. Stephens' body, called it the body of a female. Our Legislature has some sort of a bill under consideration in respect to the marriage of a female under guardianship. We object that this le giving too comprehensive a scope to legislation. Let the brutes manage their matrimonial alliances without interference; it is quite enough for the Legislature to see to it that men and women come together properly. In the index to the revised statutes we find plenty of references to acts of legislation respecting females, but women are not even mentioned. But we are glad to say that the statutes themselves are more decent than the index, for upon referring to the different places where the index says females are provided for, we find that the legislation is all about the women. The misuse of females for women is most provoking when heard from the pulpit, and we hear it quite as often there as anywhere. As for newspapers, they ein in it continually.

Now let it be understood that, according to the only authority recognized in these parts, a "female" is "one of that sex which conceives and brings forth young," or, "among plants that which produces fruit—that which bears the pistil and receives the pollen of the male flowers." When men speak of females let them say what animal or vegetable they refer to, and if they mean the females of men, why should they not say women, which is a definite, decent, respectful, and every way orthodox word? Let us have no more namby-pamby, fussy, sentimental talk about females. It disgusts a wholesome taste. [Springfield Republican.

Cotton—Preparation for Planting and Culture.

The demand for cotton, present prices, and the high prices demanded for negroes and land, make cotton now more an absorbing subject than ever before. Though the cotton merchants, and especially those interested in speculation who held the crop of 1858 will be over three and one-half millions, a larger one than was ever grown, yet ten cents in New Orleans would satisfy very few. Improved culture is now becoming a matter of necessity, and he who can grow two bales, where only one grew before, and would teach us so to do, would be worthy of a monument "more lasting than brass." That the liberal soul shall be made fat" can now be verified, because we believe he who is liberal enough to take first rate care of his negroes, procure and take first rate care of a No. 1 team, get the labor-saving implements, and the best of all carts, can almost make "two blades of grass grow where only one grew before."

Before entering upon the preparation of soil, let us dwell somewhat upon preparing the proper tools. When a boy we knew, an Englishman, who moved to Columbia, South Carolina, and without any thought or labor stumbled into a fine and well furnished house, carriage and horses, and all "the fools" necessary for a gentlemnn—his childless brother had made all this by much labor and thought, and invited him "over the water" to partake. Well so it was, we were trudging up a hill from the "water works," just being commenced by our father, when we overtook this puff ball, who had served his time as a tallow chandler or soap boiler, when we—this English gentleman and our noble self—fell into conversation, he wanted to knew what was to be our calling in life, supposing we would take to the jack-plane as our illustrious "predecessor" had done—we were then perhaps twelve years of age and somewhat of a fast boy, when out of ded'e eight. We "thought of being a gentleman." He said, "that is right, if you only had the tools." Now to be a planter, and to do ourself, our country, and our race, our whole duty, we need "the tools." We now state, we know, when we call names and when not, we nems several.

The "Brinley Steel Plow," trus we make it for sale, and if we did not regard it as the best, we would not say so. If Brinley, the prince of plow makers, was worthy our praise before he came to Mississippi, he is worthy now, and though we are third owner of all the concern, yet we dare say what we believe. If you do not like them, gentlemen, no need to get them.

"The Randal Planter," or "Stewart's Planter," or "Redhend's Planter," or Pierce's Drill"—names called as they came to our notice, either will open the drill, sow and cover cotton-seed from eight to ten acres per day.

"Mississippi Scraper," made by Taylor; "York Scraper," made by Wason & Cook; a modified block scraper, made by Kelker, all of Hinds, either will scrape from three to five acres per day and do good work.

We can, with three aed one-half to four and one-half foot rows, make the first or last do as pretty and as good work at five to six and one-half dollars as the others at ten dollars. We dare not say only as we believe, to please any one on earth. But steel hoes and the "Scoval hoe" we prefer, especially that pattern, and eight to eight and one-half inches wide.

"Solid Sweeps" made correct, a model we have ourselves hammered out of lead, we think superior and will have some few made. "Brinley's Expanding Cultivator," for corn or for cotton. "Gullet Stand," Gullet, Gindney & Co., will make cotton to sell for one cent if fair, or one-half cent more in the pound if ordinary, and the new roller stand, made near Philadelphia, either, will turn oat, say five bales, equal to "Carver stand," at least, at two bales.

"Prescott's Gin Feeder" will save one hand in every ginhouse where four to six bales are ginned per day.

And lastly we speak of the "Provost Improved Press"—never saw a bale pressed on it, but we think full as expeditious as "McComb's" no danger and more power, which with iron hoops to tie, should pass thirty bales per day; with which "tools" and man who is a manager, ought to make now near double as much as was made when we entered our log cabin here about January 1, 1831.

We certainly can with these, plant a crop better and sooner by one half; we can scrape doubly as much, we can gin doubly as much and with less labor, can press doubly, aye, trebly as much, and we want science alike applied to gin geuring and to wagons; we ought to have steam, or a gearing for two horses to gin, by changing once or twice, six bales per day, give speed and regular motion; and four to six mules to draw ten bales the distance we now have to haul to railroads.

Our planters do not prize these blessings, Mechanics have done much for us in the past ten years. Cotton culture is no more now what it was forty years ago, than is the "universal Yankees nation; then the Yankees looked up to us, now we have yielded inch after inch, foot after foot, yard after yard, until we are spanned—but to the matter.

We have a plow, if made properly, can turn over the three to four inches of soil and sub-soil, say eight inches, as readily as the old "Dagon" or "Carey," (and as light too) did nt four inches.

Coleman can with his fourteen inch mill make double the meal, and better meal than we used to with "Cullen Rock" and a thirty-eight inch stone. We have to expediate work, and the "liberal soil" only to enjoys the fruit thereof.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

JAMES H. POWELL departed this life in Jackson, La., on the 26th of March, last. He was born in Berlin, Worcester county, Maryland, on the 26th of May, 1819; emigraled al an early age to Louisiana, and engaged as clerk in one of the earlier mercantile houses of this place. Of a kind and even tempered disposition naturally, he, by a strictly upright demeanor, passed the allurements of boyhood without the wreck of his moral character. Some, who knew him in those earlier times when he was but a youth, lived to witness his funeral obsequies; and then, as they paid the last tribute of kindly regard, attested that "a good man had gone." For several years past he had lived a planter in this vicinity, happy in the bosom of an affectionate family, surrounded by a neighborhood of friends. Some four years since he united with the Methodist Church, of which he lived an acceptable member till his death. His seat in the sanctuary was seldom vacant, and his heart was large and free towards the charities of the gospel. He had but very lately commenced the merchandize business in this place, under the most flattering omens. With many fast friends, his prospects of success were large—yet scarce was the scene opened, ere he was summoned from his labors. Such is life! Man seems but to begin to live, when he dies. He leaves a wife, three children, and a large circle of relations and friends to mourn his loss. They sorrow, not, however, as those without hope. For "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord." He sleeps, saith the Master; and though in the coldness and silence of the grave, yet when Jesus shall have come, he will call forth the beloved, True, as relations and friends, we realize the loss of an estimable and useful citizen, yet we must remember, that an unerring providence has but trasferred him to the "assembly and church of the first born," and to "the spirits just men made perfect." May the Holy Spirit of consolation brood over our hearts, and enkindle afresh the Christian hope to linger on awhile in faith, awaiting until we too shall be called to our reward, and to the society of the loved ones gone before us.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vessy, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing, at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity.
Respectfully, J. W. VESSY.

[For the Conservative.]
Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.
DEAR VESSY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family; I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMITUGE was a sovereign remedy against the terrible nacny of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.
On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.
Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one; (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.
These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy, heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMITUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observations.
W. H. VASSER.

ARMINIANISM AND CALVINISM.

Election and Reprobation.

"What hath God especially decreed concerning men and angels?" "God, by an eternal and immutable decree, out of His mere love, for the praise of His glorious grace, to be manifested in all time, hath elected some chosen angels to glory, and, in Christ, some men to eternal life, and the means thereof; and, also, according to His sovereign power, and the unsearchable counsel of His own will, hath passed by and fore-ordained the rest to dishonor and wrath, to be for their sin inflicted, to the praise of the glory of His justice." Larger Catechism.

"Many indeed, as if they wished to avert odium from God, admit election in such a way, as to deny that any one is reprobated; but this is puerile and absurd. Because election itself could not exist without being opposed to reprobation. Whom God passes by, therefore, He reprobates; and from no other cause than His determination to exclude them from the inheritance which He predestinates for His children." Calvin, Institutes. Vol. II., p. 163.

"Though it is sufficiently clear that God in His secret counsel freely chooses whom He will, and rejects others, His gratuitous election is but half displayed, till it come to particular individuals to whom God not only offers salvation, but assigns it in such a manner that the certainty is liable to no suspicion or doubt." Calvin.

"Predestination, we call the eternal decree of God; by which He has determined in Himself what He would have to become of every individual of mankind; for they are not all created with a similar destiny; but eternal life is foreordained for some, and eternal damnation for others. Every man, therefore, being created for the one or the other of these ends, we say, is predestinated either to life or death." Calvin, Vol. II., p. 145.

"But though the fall is pre-supposed to their reprobation, it will appear that the former was not the reason of the latter; if we recollect that those who were chosen to salvation were exactly in the same situation. If there was sin in the reprobate, there was sin also in the elect; and we must, therefore, resolve their opposite allotments into the will of God; who gives and withholds His favor according to His pleasure." Dick's Theology.

"It is an awful decree, I must confess; but no one can deny that God foreknew the future and final fate of man before He created him; and that He did foreknow it, because it was appointed by Him, or decreed." Calvin, Vol. II., p. 170.

"God from all eternity decreed to leave some of Adam's fallen race in their sins, and to exclude them from the participation of Christ's benefits. * * * Some men were from all eternity not only negatively excepted from a participation of Christ and salvation, but positively ordained to continue in their natural blindness and hardness of heart. Toplady on Predestination, pp. 105, 106.

All the principal Calvinistic writers utter the same sentiments.

The following seems to be a fair deduction from these statements.

First, That God decreed from eternity the fall of Adam, and the ruin or fall of his posterity with him.

Second, That, regarding man as fallen, he elected some men, whose names and number were designated, unto everlasting life.

Third, That those, thus predestinated, were so predestinated unchangeably and unconditionally, without any reference whatever to their works or character.

Fourth, That for these and these only he provided a Savior, and all the means necessary to procure their salvation, without any condition on their part.

Fifth, That the persons thus unchangeably designated cannot possibly perish, do what they may, but will be irresistibly drawn to Christ and to justification, adoption and sanctification.

Sixth, With respect to the rest, whose names and number are also definitely fixed, that he passed them by in their time, and predestinated them to destruction.

Seventh, That they were thus passed and predestinated from eternity, and so were ordained to destruction before they were born, of the good pleasure of God and to the glory of his sovereign justice.

Eighth, That for these he never did provide a Savior, and, consequently, they could not be saved do what they might.

Ninth, That those reprobated, in no respect differed from those elected; and the one class were elected and the other class reprobated, of the mere sovereign pleasure of God, without any respect to any difference in them whatever." Foster's Objections to Calvinism.

Without further comment on the Calvinistic dogma of Election and Reprobation, we leave it to the reader to determine its conformity or non-conformity with the character of God.

VERITAS.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

MAN WORSHIP.

H. "But, before we go any further, I wish to know if it was the preacher you joined, when you connected yourself with the Church, or did you join the Church as the Church of God, with a view of bettering yourself and glorifying God, by being more useful among men? You are continually harping on the eloquence of Brother ———, and quarreling with the Conference for sending us no better preacher than our present minister; and, instead of co-operating with him and the members generally in behalf of the cause of God and the interest of souls you seldom attend church, and take little or no interest in these things. I am afraid you have done like too many other hangers on about Zion—joined the preacher instead of the Church!"

M. "Well! I am sure I thought I was joining the church; but I do confess that I was very much pleased with the ability of Brother ———, and am glad that our church has such a minister as he is."

H. "That is all very well. All of us feel grateful to God for such sanctified ability; and would that we had more of it. But when we suffer the endowments of the creature to turn us aside from the Creator, we are being led in the wrong direction. And when we assume to ourselves that we will not be served but by the best, we are guilty of criminal dictation, and also of arrogance not at all becoming those, not worthy of gathering crumbs from the master's table, much less to be fed with his richer viands at the hands of his most honored servants. The gospel, at the hands of God's most humble minister, is much more than the best of us deserve."

M. "I may be in error, but I do like to hear good preaching very much."

H. "And no one blames you for that. But does not our present minister preach well; though in matter and style different from your favorite? And as to his knowledge of the scriptures and divine things, good judges declare him to be equal to any man we have had for years, and the pious lovers of truth profess to be much pleased and profited by his efforts; and then his preaching is telling on his congregation. There has not been such a spirit of awakening among us for a long time as there is now; and, besides this and best of all, people are being converted to God and added to the church. And were all of us to do our duty as members of the church, and co-operate with him fully, no telling the amount of success that heaven would vouchsafe to us."

M. "Yes. I have heard of his success; but is it not among the young and inexperienced? I have heard of but few grown persons being moved, and scarcely any of the more intelligent, and those in the higher walks of life; and this is why I have contended that he is not the man for us. We want a man whose ability will command the respect of the first classes of society."

H. "You 'have heard of his success!' And why have you not witnessed it yourself, as others have done? Ah, my Brother! this reveals to us a very significant fact, that you are not interested, either in the efforts of the minister or the cause of God, as you should be as a member of the church and a follower of the Lord Jesus.

"And then, a little investigation will show you that similar results are attending his ministry, to those that attended the ministry of the Savior and the apostles themselves. 'Not many wise men, after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called.' Still the opposers acknowledged that 'Never man spake as did this man!' Now, why was the unequaled preaching of Christ and the apostles attended with no better success among those in the higher walks of life? Was it on account of any defect in the preaching? No, my Brother, but on account of the 'offence of the cross.' And similar results have attended apostolic preaching down to the present day. It will be an offence to the coin and proud, the 'lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God.'

"And now, I hope you will take no offence when I say, that you have furnished us with additional evidence that you were not influenced by proper motives when you joined the Church. Hearers and members, of your class, think of and are interested in preaching, as you are in any other fine performance—in a literary address, a political speech, or a fine theatrical performence; just as the sportsman is interested in, and pleased with the fine parts and successful performance of his racer. For the time, you are delighted, and great friends of the Church. And maybe, if you could live with your favorite preacher all the time, you might get to heaven; but, even then, there would be danger of your making the fatal discovery, when too late, that you had only been 'gazing up into heaven,' and had made but little preperation for that place."

M. "Of course, Brother H, I must not become offended; but this is very plain talk! Do you mean to say that all who are fond of fine preaching have no religion?"

H. "I do not say that, Brother M; but I must think that you have the conviction on your own mind, that you have but few marks of a true disciple. Christ says—'My sheep hear my voice and follow me, and the voice of a stranger they will not follow.' You have not listened so much for the voice of the master, as that of his servant. Again—'If any man will be my disciple, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me.' You have not even self-denial enough to allow God to decide by whom you shall hear the word of life. And as to cross-bearing, when did you commence it? Seldom, at preaching; never, at prayer or class meeting; no family altar; and, I fear, but little if any private and personal communings with God! How much do you groan for full redemption? When did you mourn, over the languishing state of Zion? O! when, with sighs and groans, did you pray God to revive His work and save the people? For whose conversion have you prayed night and day? And lastly, when and how much have you prayed heaven's blessing on our minister and his labors? Until these questions can be answered as the faithful servant alone can answer them, it is altogether out of place and highly unbecoming, for you to speak disparagingly of our faithful minister's performance. Do your duty; and then, if need be, find fault, and cast stones!"

PRAYING FOR THE SICK.

Is it a fact that prayer will save the sick? It is incorporated in our very nature, when in trouble, distress, or affliction, to look to other sources than ourselves for help. Hence, calling upon those around us to aid us in our extremities, resorting to amusements, games, and all things of a like nature, and even to the intoxicating bowl, are very common among us. But then those who do resort to such means are ultimately, if not at first, compelled to acknowledge the rule of a superior power over us.

The Christian, however, admits—and joyously too—that the destinies of men are in the hands of a righteous God, whom, he is taught, will hear and answer prayer: one in whom exists the power to control diseases and raise the dead. There lies before me, while I write, an old book, too much neglected, from which I extract the following sentences:

"Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray. * * * Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil, in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up."

Have any of your readers ever tried the directions? They come from a high source. Are they not worthy a serious consideration, and adoption? Do not Christians often fail in this regard? And are they not culpable too? Or if they do send for the elders, do they not send when it is too late? It occurs to your correspondent, that it is quite censurable for persons professing Christianity, when they get sick to neglect to inform their pastor, that he may visit and comfort them, and pray with and for them, until an unreasonable and unfavorable time, when such a course might be utterly impracticable. When first met by disease why not then without delay attend to the interests of the soul as well as the body? The physician is early called, why not then let the minister accompany him?

But we have run off with these musings, and digressed somewhat from what was intended. We set out to give a case or two, where, when all other means had failed, and so confessed by the physician, prayer proved effectual.

It was in early Spring of 185—, soon after the writer had gone to his circuit, a female member of his charge was taken sick, and constantly grew worse and worse. The minister, in company with his wife, visited the house, but he was not admitted to her bed-side to administer the consolations of the gospel or to inspire her with renewed energy to keep her faith in Christ, until she was fast sinking into the embrace of death, and her friends were expecting every breath to be her last. When midnight hour had closed its drapery around, the minister was summoned to see her.

Arriving at her residence, he found that she had given to all her last adieu and final charge; and so far gone, she could not speak above a whisper. After making a few inquiries about her spiritual condition, prayer was proposed. We knelt beside her dying form, and all earnestly prayed that heaven would smile upon her last moments, and, if consistent with the divine will, to spare her life. We prayed, and sung "How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord!" The Spirit of the holy one was sent upon us in that trying moment, and "the parched ground became a pool of water, and the wilderness rejoiced and blossomed as the rose." The effectual prayer had reached the power behind the throne; heaven was opened; a blessing given; the shout of praise was heard from those dying lips; a reaction that moment took place in her physical system, and she was in no great while restored to health and strength.

So true it is—"The prayer of faith shall save the sick."

In the same village lived Judge J—. The ensuing summer he was attacked with disease. Day after day his physicians attended him; but all to no effect. He grew worse, until his attendants and friends gave him up to die. Just at this time, when all hope was gone, the physician who had attended the female in the foregoing case, said—"send for the preacher." The writer in a short time was by him in his sickness.

"Doctor," said the preacher, "is there no hope in his case?"

"None;" he replied. "He must die."

After a few moments conversation with the judge, (he was a member of the Baptist Church) he requested us to pray for him. During prayer, the Spirit visited his soul; he shouted aloud, "glory! glory!" And, from that solemn but precious moment he began to convalesce, and in course of time he was also restored to health and strength.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

CANTON, La., April 17, 1859.

MR. EDITOR: I have been surprised that Harper's Weekly has so long escaped the attention of the religious press, and particularly the press of the Methodist Church South. If its circulation had been confined to railroad-cars, steamboats, and cock-pits—where the police gazetteers usually circulate—I should have taken it as something usual and unavoidable; but there is hardly a family in this section in which I do not find Harper's Weekly by the side of the Christian Advocate. Think me not uncharitable, when I say it is the wolf by the side of the lamb—and the lamb too led to the slaughter without opening his mouth. I fear it is because the wolf is in sheeps clothing; the Advocate and those who read Harper's Weekly never thinking of its pernicious influence.

Is there a steamboat explosion or railroad accident, in which hundreds are killed, an engraving of the dead and the dying, with a minute account of their sufferings, constitute the next number of Harper's Weekly. Is there a murder perpetrated, at which humanity shudders—a likeness of the murderer from a photograph by Brady, and an engraving of the lifeless victim, the scene of the murder, with a tedious description of its sickening details, make up the frontispiece of the next number. Is there a seduction and murder—what a feast for its classic taste!—figures enough for a family group, all photographs from Brady; and by skillful economy frontispieces enough, until some more revolting crime is perpetrated. A likeness of the manslayer, with a picture how he held his revolver, and how his victim fell. A likeness of his friend, decoying the victim to delay while the revolver was prepared. A portrait of the seducer, waving the white handkerchief; and a drawing of the house in which the seduction was perpetrated, with its windows and doors and secluded retreat. A portrait of the dishonored wife, with a description—how beautiful, how voluptuous! A sketch of her life—how beautiful when young; how she and her husband loved. All this is told not because it is of any interest in itself, but because the woman carried on a guilly intrigue, was detected in her adultery, and her accomplice slain. What a feast of dainties for chaste mothers and modest daughters; what a blessing to have such a family newspaper! So classical; so edifying. The readers of Harper's Weekly cannot deny the truth of our representations. If I had found them in the Police Gazette; in Helen Jewit; or, sketches from the life of a highwayman—I should have passed them unnoticed; but I cannot refrain from expressing my astonishment that a paper, made up of such cannibalisms should be countenanced as a family newspaper. If such reading matter is edifying, let us place as standard works in our libraries the lives of John A. Murrel, Helen Jewett, and a hundred others of a kindred character.

But let us seriously inquire whether such reading is productive of good or evil. We have heard, that the Messrs. Harpers justify it upon the ground that, by the perusal of the incidents of crime the mind will revolt at it and take the side of virtue. If so let us not only take Harper's Weekly, but let us take our children to the haunts of vice and crime, that they may receive a still stronger repugnance. Let us take them to the cockpit, the fishmarket, the bawdy-house, the grog-shop, and engage for them a season ticket to the scenes of every murder and execution; when we are through teaching the Bible at Sunday-school, let us read them a few chapters from the lessons of crime; the last number of Harper's Weekly. What parent does not shudder at such a scheme of education! Who that does not know that those who have spent their lives amid scenes of crime, those who have been raised in the grog-shop, and the cockpit are always the degraded men?

But it is useless to discuss a proposition so plain. Every one knows that the bloody scenes in Harper's Weekly are published not for their moral influence, but for money, to meet the demand of a degraded taste; a species of moral cannibalism, which is a disgrace to our age, and country.

A MEMBER OF THE METHODIST CHURCH.

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN GERMANY.

A comparison of the religious statistics of Germany in 1840 with those of 1858 shows that the number of Protestants in nearly every State has increased in a larger ratio than that of Roman Catholics. In Hanover, for instance, the number of Protestants in 1843 was 1,400,000, and that of Roman Catholics 200,000; in 1858 the number of Protestants amounted to 1,610,000, that of Roman Catholics to 217,000; showing for the former an increase of 16 per cent., and for the latter of only 8 per cent. The whole number of Protestants in the States of the German Confederacy is at present 20,100,000, that of Catholics 23,150,000. If we include all the non-German provinces which are under the scepters of Austria and Prussia, the proportion is as follows: Protestants, 25,300,000; Catholics, 40,150,000. In consequence of the more frequent intermigration of the two denominations, the exclusively Protestant or Catholic character of some German states disappears entirely. Protestant congregations arising in the Catholic countries, and Catholic congregations in the Protestant countries. But it is a remarkable point of difference that, while no case is known where a whole Protestant congregation has turned Catholic, a number of instances may be adduced in all parts of Germany where whole Catholic congregations, or at least the majority of them, have been received into the Evangelical Church. If the number of Catholic priests who have turned Protestant were compared with the number of Protestant clergyman who have gone over to Rome, the former number would be found to be at least four times as great as the second. In the Grand Duchy of Baden alone no less than sixteen priests have been received into the Evangelical Church during the last forty years, among whom were four doctors of divinity, one professor of theology at the University of Freiburg, and the Rev. Mr. Henhofer, now one of the leading evangelical clergymen in Southwestern Germany. [Ad. & Jou.]

LETTER FROM EAST TEXAS.

MR. EDITOR: The weather for the last ten or twelve days has been unfavorable for the crops. A few nights ago there was a light frost; but little damage however was done to the crops and gardens. A norther is still blowing; and I fear that there will be yet a killing frost. Unusual industry is being exercised among the planters. During the past winter and fall there has been a greater accession to the population of Eastern Texas than in any previous year. The excellent quality of the lands and the certainty of crops have arrested the attention of emigrants, and induced them to settle here in unusual numbers. Our towns are frequently full of strangers seeking homes in Texas, many of whom will stop here, and some will go further West. Should the present season prove productive, as there is every reason to believe, it will, the permanent prosperity of Eastern Texas may be established. Money will be plenty, and provisions of all kinds will be abundant.

It is true that the farmers have been put to some inconvenience to get their cotton to market this season, in consequence of the low waters in our rivers, especially in the Trinity river. There is now a large quantity of cotton on its banks which in all probability will have to be hauled on wagons to Houston or to Liberty.

But the Neches and Sabine Rivers have been in good boating order for some time, and a large amount of cotton has been brought down these rivers on steam and flatboats; and several steamers are still making regular trips, and perhaps they will keep up until all the cotton will be taken to market, and the people supplied with goods and groceries. Several new stage contracts have been recently established, in South eastern Texas. There is a line from Chuncyville, in La., near Red River, to Huntsville, in Texas. This line runs through an important part of our State, and is distined to be one of the best paying lines in Texas.

There is also a line from Wise's Bluff on the Neches river to San Augustine; it connects with the Steamer T. J. Smith, the regular mail packet from Sabine Pass to Wise's Bluff; and this steamer connects with the steamship Matagorda, from Berwick's Bay—thus passengers can reach your city in a few days.

The people are awake on the subject of educating their children, but I have written enough for one time, and will therefore close.

LAWRENCE.

April 5th, 1859.

THE THEATER AND THE DANCE.

We are pleased to find that both Bishops M'Ilvaine and Mead bear a decided testimony against the theater and the dance. Bishop M'Ilvaine, in his pastoral letter, thus writes:

"Let me now turn to two objects, in which there is no difficulty of discrimination—the theater and the dance. The only line I would draw in regard to these is that of entire exclusion. And yet, my brethern, I am well aware how easy it is for the imagination to array both of these in such an abstract elementary simplicity, so divested of all that gives them their universal character and relish, that no harm could be detected in either. And the same precisely can be easily done with the card-table and the horse-race. The exercise of graceful movement in the dance, and the exercise of speed in the horse-race, may easily be conceived of in such a light as to make them very innocent. But what if they were attempted to be got up under such an abstract form, and made common amusement in such elementary simplicity, how would they succeed? Their dendness as to all that makes their usual interest would be their sufficient condemnation. The question is not what we can imagine they may be; but what they always have been, and will be, and must be, in such a world as this, to render them pleasurable to those who patronize them. Strip them bare, till they stand in the simple innocence to which their defender's argument would reduce them, and the world would not have them. To be genial to the taste of those who most sustain them, they must be matters of worldly fashion and gayety; and not only so, but designed to promote the spirit of such things, and so dependent on them, that in proportion as these condiments are lacking they are rejected as insipid. Were the trial made of a series of dancing assemblies, conducted in all respects as becomes the sobriety and spiritual-mindedness of the Christian character, so that it would be nothing inconsistent if every attendant were a devout and earnestly pious person, it would need no prophet to predict their entire failure. The word would ridicule such a dance; and Christian people would think that they had something else to do than to attend to it.

The venerable Bishop Meal, a model episcopos, fully indorses the views of his honored colleague of Ohio. See his Baptismal Vows and Worldly Amusements:

As an amusement, seeing that it is a perversion of an ancient religious exercise, and has ever been discouraged by the sober-minded and pious of all nations, on account of its evil tendencies and accompaniments, we ought conscientiously to inquire whether its great liability to abuse, and its many acknowledged abuses, should not make us frown upon it in all its forms? I will briefly allude to some of the objections to it: When taught to the young at an early age, it is attended with expense of time and money which might be far better employed; it promotes the love of dress and pleasure, to which the young are already too prone; it tempts to vanity and love of display; it induces a strong desire to enter on the amusements of the world at an early period, in order to exhibit the accomplishments thus required, and to enjoy a pleasure for which a taste has been formed; it leads the young ones exactly into an opposite direction to that pointed out by the word of God, and pledged in the baptismal vows. Thus educated, they are, in this respect at least, trained not in the way they ought to go, but in the way they ought to forsake, according to almost universal consent, if by divine grace they are ever turned to God in true penitence and faith.

VALUE OF READING IN OLDEN TIMES.

In the days of Jack Cade few could read, except those who were actually in orders, or educated for that purpose; so that if a person was arraigned before a temporal judge for any crime (the punishment whereof was death) he might pray his clergy; that was, to have a Latin Bible of a black Gothic character delivered to him; and if he could read a passage where the judge appointed, which was generally in the Psalms, the ordinary or his deputy, who stood near, said, legit ut clericus, that is, he could read like a clerk or scholar, and the criminal was acquitted as being a man of learning, who might therefore be useful to the public; if, however, he could not read, he suffered death. This privilege was granted in all offences, except high treason and sacrilege, until after the year 1530; and it was carried to such an extent, that if a criminal was condemned at one assize, because he could not read, he might again claim this benefit, either at that time, or even under the gallows tree, and if he could then read he was pardoned, of which there was an instance in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.—Shakspeare a Lawyer.

AN EDUCATED MINISTRY.—"An unlearned theology," said Melancthon, "is an Illiad of evils." "If we lose the learned languages by neglect," said Luther, "we shall lose the Gospel."

ETHNOLOGY.

Bowen and Baldwin.

Rev. Mr. Bowen, late missionary to Africa, lectured before the Young Men's Christian Association, of Macon, Ga., and is thus reported by the Index:

"While it is doubted whether ethnology is as yet sufficiently understood to be classed with the established sciences, we think the views of Mr. Bowen more reasonable than the opinions of many who have preceded him in this field of investigation. He evidently does his own thinking, and it would be no easy task, as it appeared to us to overturn his theories or successfully contest his views. Still, on a subject which is so deeply enshrouded in the mystery of the past, we should not too hastily form our conclusions.

"His theme was announced as, The Ethnology of the Negro Races. He did not design delivering an oration, but simply to state facts. There were three primary colors impressed upon the human family, and these were permanent and inflexible. All shades and tints ranging between these originals were the result of amalgamation or enervation, which latter term the speaker preferred using. Numerous facts were presented to show that all varieties of color were only modifications of black, yellow, and white. But how were these primitive colors to be accounted for? Climate could not solve the problem—for white men remain white in the hottest climates, while black men continue black in the coldest. In the speaker's opinion, these specific differences were the effects of distinct creations. It was as easy for Jehovah to create varieties in connection with natural propagation, as it was to create the first man out of the dust of the earth. Because a child was born, it was no less a distinct creation of God, than a chicken because it was hatched. Every new being, whether in the animal or vegetable kingdom, was a creation by almighty power, and it was upon this principle that the speaker accounted for specific differences in physical conformation, anatomical structure or mental degrees and peculiarities. A large array of facts seemingly confirmed these views.

"Notwithstanding these varieties, however, the lecturer maintained the truth of the Bible record, that God out of one blood made all nations of men. His position was supported by adequate proofs, but especially by the fact, that the gospel of Christ is adapted to and produces similar effects upon all mankind."

From what we have heard of Mr. Bowen's positions, says the last number of the Nashville Christian Advocate, we are inclined to think he has been anticipated, in all that is new and probable in his theory, by Rev. S. D. Baldwin, of the Tennessee Conference. Our friend Baldwin's hook, Dominion, has furnished a good deal of thunder on that subject, for which he gets no credit. The main position of the book, that the ninth chapter of Genesis contains the ethnology and the divine and social constitution of the post-deluvinn world, is destined to be a great gathering point of thoughtful minds.

ITALIAN UNIVERSITIES.

A decree of the Emperor of Austria, issued in October, 1858, makes important changes at the old universities of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, at Pavia and Padua. The compulsory use of prescribed text books, the great drawback of literary progress at the Austrian universities in former times, has been abolished; and, what is of particular importance, the German institution of Privat-dorents, which until now has been entirely unknown in Italy, has been introduced. The Privat-dorents or private lecturers, are the youngest class of German professors, who, having passed the examen rigorosum are authorized to deliver lectures at the university like the regular professors, though they generally receive no salary from the State, and depend for their support on lecture-fees, private tuition, and extra literary labor. As nothing recommends them more efficiently for their advancement to a regular professorship, than the publication of a literary work of superior merit, this preparatory stage of university professorships has become a main wheel in the grand literary machinery of Germany. Since the revolution of 1848, a closer literary intercourse has sprung up between the European nations; and among other German institutions, that of the Privat-dorents has been introduced into several countries. It is an arrangement worthy of consideration in this country. Several new chairs have also been created at Pavia and Padua, most of which have been filled with young Italians who have pursued their studies in Germany. Two Germans have been appointed as professors of Classical Philology, a science which at present is but little cultivated in Italy. Greek literature, in particular, has been so generally neglected, that hardly a single work of lasting importance has been produced during the present century by all Italy. Only within a few years they have commenced to feel this want, and preparations are made in several parts of Italy to raise the universities to a level with those of Germany. In order to promote these efforts, the Austrian government has established several stipends, some of them amounting to 600 florins, by which talented Italian students will be enabled to visit the best universities of Europe, and there to prepare for a professorship at an Italian university. [Exchange.]

A GEM FROM BEECHER.

IN ONE of his recent sermons, Henry Ward Beecher said: "In the Spring air the crocus is baring its breast to the sunshine—and the violet beneath the hedge looks up to the light. And as the sunshine comes down, and colors and warms and penetrates the flowers, so the sun, light of God's Spirit touches our naked souls, and our whole nature expands in its vivific life." Again: "Nature nurses well her darlings. In the Autumn she lays the little folded leaf in its soft, brown cradle, tucked in with wax and gum,—and then she says: 'Blow away rough winds of winter, you cannot reach my child.' But when Spring comes, and by a persuasion which we know not of—woos forth the buds and blossoms, the leaf bursts from its cerements, and springs forth to dance in the light. And the little brown shell in which it slept in its incipient life shrivels and drops, for it is no longer needed. Suppose in the summer hours, this shell should come back—and say to the live, full-orbed leaf: 'Come, fold yourself up and lie down in your cradle again,'—Do you think the leaf would do it? Do you think it could? The cradle has shrunk as much as the leaf has grown. No! it would be impossible. No more can we in this Summer of the world, we, who have grown in the liberty with which Christ has made us free, go back and lie down in the bosom of some narrow creed—some old dead form which Christ's coming burst asunder."

SHALL I BE ONE OF THEM?

How divinely full of glory and pleasure shall that hour be, when all the millions of mankind that have been redeemed by the blood of the Lamb of God shall meet together and stand around him, with every tongue and every heart full of joy and praise! How astonishing will be the glory and the joy of that day, when all the saints shall join together in one common song of gratitude and love, and of everlasting thankfulness to their Redeemer! With what unknown delight and inexpressible satisfaction shall all that are saved from the ruins of sin and hell address the Lamb that was slain, and rejoice in his presence!—Dr. Watts.

NEWSPAPER READING IN PRUSSIA.

THE post department in Berlin publishes yearly a list of newspapers received through the post-offices. This is a useful guide for the postmaster, for in Prussia, as in all the other German States, the periodicals are generally not ordered directly from the publishers, nor through booksellers or agents, but through the post-office, which receives the amount of subscription, of course always in advance, and takes the responsibility of furnishing to the subscriber every number.—Whenever a single number is miscarried, which occurs very rarely, a duplicate is procured. This affords to publishers of periodicals the advantage that they never have subscribers who are in arrears, and to the subscribers of every town and village that they will not lose a portion of the expected number of copies by irregularities in the delivery, but that they will have, at the end of the term, a complete set. At the same time this annual list of periodicals is an interesting statistical index of European newspapers, and of the amount of newspaper reading in Prussia. We believe it is the most copious list of this kind published in all Europe. It enumerates 1563 German papers, among which are 350 political, and 666 in foreign languages. The most numerous among the latter are the French, which amounts to 322, of which 8 are published in Switzerland, 3 in Russia, 2 in Italy, 2 in Holland, 3 in Germany, 1 in Spain, 1 in England, 1 in Turkey, 1 in Algeria. Among 168 English papers, which are contained in the list, 22 are from the United States of America. Of the 36 Russian papers 1 is published in London, by Alexander Herzen; but its circulation in Prussia is now forbidden. Of 29 Polish papers seven are published in Austria, 4 in Prussia, 1 in France, 1 in England. The three Wendish* papers are all published in Germany. The only Lithuanian paper, Keleivis, and the political Hebrew gazette, are both published in the province of Eastern Prussia.

*The Wends are a Slavonin tribe, the remnants of which are still inhabiting Lusatia. Their number amounts to about 150,000, one-third of whom belong to the kingdom of Saxony, and the other two-thirds to Prussia. [Christian Advocate and Journal.

SPEAK KINDLY OF YOUR PASTOR.

MANY Christians inflict serious harm on their pastors and on the cause of Christ by their careless gossip and habits of captiousness. An idle word of censure, forgotten perhaps as soon as uttered, leaves a permanent impression on the minds of children and visitors, and works mischief in the future. While Christians are human, we suppose it is useless to hope for a perfect cure of this vice, but the following words of advice are pertinent:

"In all your transactions with your minister deal with him candidly and honestly. Hold his reputation as a sacred thing. Never by word or deed permit yourselves to injure it; if you do, you injure his usefulness and your own interests. If you think you have ground for faultfinding, tell him, that's the manly and Christian course; but never whisper scandal about him to others in his absence. Especially never speak derogatively of him before the young. Parents little know what they do when they permit themselves to censure his conduct, or disparage his work in the presence of their children. Many a young heart has thus been alienated from the minister and from truth, ere yet it has been brought under the salutary influence of either. That accounts, in many instances, for the fact that children do not follow in the steps of their parents by identifying themselves with the Churches to which those belong, and this in its turn often accounts for children breaking loose from religious restraints and influences altogether. Not till the issues of time are revealed in eternity shall we see all the wrong that has resulted from the evil I have just deprecated. May every Church be saved from it!"

THE "FAREWELL SERMON."

A METHODIST clergyman records the following, as an interesting reminiscence connected with his first farewell sermon: I had preached my last sermon at a favorite appointment on my first circuit. The people had been kind and generous, and I loved them dearly. The house was full; it was my final appeal to the flock beloved; and though almost overcome with emotion, I had got through, somehow, with the "farewell sermon," my first and last. I knew that either from sympathy or sorrow the congregation was sharing largely in my feelings—that I was not alone "in the melting mood." As I sat down overwhelmed with grief at the sore parting—I repeat, that it was my first circuit—a local preacher, whom I had invited to close the service, rose, and opening the hymn book at random, read in solemn tones the hymn commencing:

"Jesus, we lift our souls to thee;
Thy Holy Spirit breathe;
And let this little infant be Baptized into thy death."

The effect of this ridiculously mal-apropos selection you may possibly imagine, but I cannot describe. [Christian Advocate.

LAMARTINE AND SCRIBE.

Lamartine is an example of a distinguished poet having survived his reputation. The more his pecuniary wants urge him to write, the more the productiveness of his genius seems to be exhausted, and his prestige consequently is waning. He is now on the point of going on a journey to Italy; where, at the tombs of Petrarch and Laura, he hopes to find new inspiration for elegies. He is seen almost every day in the Passage de l'Opera, where he examines the subscription lists laid out in his behalf. All the passers-by smile when they see Lamartine coming, but still he repeats his visits regularly. Scribe, who has become a rich man by the percentage which he has received from the theatres, for his plays, has recently been sued by a poor painter, whom he refuses to pay for a portrait under the pretext of want of likeness. Everybody is astonished at the avarice of a man who placed over his sumptuous palace the inscription: "Traveler, enter here freely, for to the building of this house you have contributed your share."

A SHREWD EDITOR.

THERE are several persons who seem to think that editors regard it as one of the greatest intellectual luxuries to "pitch into" somebody, and they suppose themselves to have conferred a great favour by furnishing belligerent contributions, in which some person, corporation, or society is soundly abused. Such people may take a hint from the following:—A noted chap once stepped into the sanctum of a venerable and highly respectable editor, and indulged in a tirade against a citizen with whom he was on bad terms. "I wish," said he, addressing the man with the pen, "that you would write a very severe article against R——, and put it in your paper." "Very well," was the reply. The next morning he came rushing into the office, in a violent state of excitement. "What did you put in your paper? I have had my nose pulled, and been kicked twice." "I wrote a severe article, as you desired," calmly replied the editor, "and signed your name to it!"

BISHOP PIERCE'S LETTERS.

Bishop Pierce, with Mrs. Pierce and their little daughter, left last evening on the Lecomte for Shreveport, on their way to California. The prayers of the Church will accompany them. The Bishop ministered the word of life while in the city, to the delight and edification of large congregations.

We are happy to state that Bishop Pierce's letters will be published in the New Orleans Christian Advocate. The popularity of his former series, and the interesting country of which he is to write, will insure the present series a wide reading.

"NURTURE AND ADMONITION OF THE LORD."

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE SABBATH SCHOOL SOCIETY.

We were pleased to hear one of our Bishops, a few days since, give utterance to the following sentiment: "If I thought I had the qualifications, I had rather fill the office of Sunday School Secretary than almost any other office in the Church. I know of no position which promises greater usefulness." This opinion we have long entertained. We feel more than ever convinced of the wisdom of the last General Conference in establishing the office. We were pleased also to hear the Bishop express the highest confidence in the ultimate success of our present worthy Sunday School Secretary, Rev. Dr. Charles Taylor. A notice of his, by the way, will be found under the head of Special Notices in this paper, to which we invite attention. We begin to be more hopeful than ever of the success of the movement to raise a Sunday School Publication Fund of $100,000. In this connection we publish an account, from the Nashville Advocate, of the annual meeting of the Sabbath School Society.

The anniversary, proper, of the Sabbath-school Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, will take place May 8th, in Columbia, S. C.; but the annual meeting was held in McKendree Church, Nashville, last Sunday afternoon, Bishop Soule in the chair. The opening religious services were conducted by Dr. Keener, who announced the hymn, page 565—

"Hear ye my law, my people, hear."— and offered an appropriate prayer.

The report of the Treasurer was read, showing a balance against the Society of something over a thousand dollars.

Dr. Taylor, the Corresponding Secretary, submitted an able report, detailing not only his services since his appointment by the General Conference, but large and valuable plans for realising the benefits expected in the creation of his office. He proposes to raise one hundred thousand dollars by simple and direct contributions for the object. With such aid suitable books may be added to the Catalogue, increased value and attractiveness may be given the publications of this department, and donations may be made to help needy Sabbath-schools, and to establish them in poor and newly-settled districts. It is a far-seeing and noble benevolence, and must commend itself to the friends of childhood and the Church. Indeed, the Corresponding Secretary has already received large pledges of favor, which the published report will make known.

Bishop Paine was introduced. He took the ground that Sunday-school work was the duty of the Church: duty as distinguished from policy. That it was a politic institution for strengthening and extending the Church, none would deny. The Bishop spoke earnestly and powerfully on the relation of childhood to the Church. Our children should be baptised and brought up in the Church. The spiritual care and oversight of them, therefore, was a duty, as a logical consequence. What portion of the Church are we at liberty to turn out—to consign to the world's care and sympathies? Not these lambs, surely. Considering their age, religious education was a necessary part of our care. The Sabbath-school teacher was the pastor's assistant in this department of his work, analogous to the class-leader, who is his helper in watching over the adult members. Sabbath-school teachers, therefore, should be converted persons, and their labors should tend to lead the children directly to God. He liked polished sermons, well-beaten oil for the sanctuary; but if some pastors would bestow more care on the Sabbath-school and the children, it would pay better for time and eternity.

In conclusion, the Bishop gave a striking fact from real life, showing how a run-down circuit, which he was advised to throw out of the plan of appointments in one of the Conference, so hopeless was the prospect of doing good, had been revived and brought up, not by a star preacher, who never does any thing but fill the pulpit, but by a plain and God-fearing laborer in the Lord's vineyard, who began his work with the establishment of Sabbath-schools, and taught himself, till he raised up teachers amongst old and young, parents and children.

Dr. Lee was the next speaker. He dwelt eloquently on the possibilities of Sabbath-school instruction in the direct conversion of children. This speaker also gave strong and burning reproof to that want of faith among us on account of which God can do no mighty work among the children. We had never yet come up to the words of Jesus, nor to his example, when he opened his arms and said, "Suffer little children to come unto me." By our silent convictions, if not our avowed position, we were obnoxious to the charge of forbidding them. "Old enough to be converted!"—away with that saying. Labor and pray for their salvation now, and leave all outside questions to God. Religion did not destroy originality of character in adults, nor the freshness of childhood. We must look for infant Christians—child-disciples; not old heads on young shoulders; not staid, prim, precise saints. Make proper and reasonable allowance for age, not in piety, but in manners. Some could not believe children to be Christians, because they did not carry themselves as they might only be expected to do at forty. All childish glee and gambol and frolic and play must yield to a religious strait-jacket! The little ones must exhibit premature sages—must be monsters, in order to become genuine Christians! And thus we were, by unreasonable conditions and expectations, shutting the door of the Church in the face of her children.

It was utterly a fault among us that so few of the great, the wise and reverend among the laity took hold of this work: it was left to young people too much. Underneath any? The wisest might doubt his fitness for it. An angel would rejoice in the commission to set up the kingdom of heaven in the heart of one of these. Go at this work, prayerfully, hopefully. Take down this book (pointing to the Bible) a seed of truth: put it in that virgin soil, drop a tear on it, breathe a prayer over it, and look for great results.

Sabbath-schools were the beginnings of Churches. The speaker would give to eminent laymen in some other denominations the explit of understanding their relation to Church-extension, which he felt compelled to deny to his own. Let our laity wake up, nor stand all the day idle. There ought to be a sprinkling of gray hairs among the teachers.

And with many other words the speaker enforced the beauty and promise and greatness of the work.

Dr. Hamilton, editor of the Sunday-school Visitor, being called out, offered the remark, enforced by few and telling sentences, that religious truth was normal to the human mind: it was the first that childhood was capable of comprehending.

Dr. Simpson enlisted the Corresponding Secretary in taking a collection.

Officers were elected for the ensuing year—a president, Bishop Soule, several vice presidents, recording secretary and treasurer, and thirty managers—and the meeting adjourned.

It was throughout a solemn religious meeting, befitting the day, the place and subject, and edifying to a large congregation. We have seldom attended any meeting of the kind with equal satisfaction and profit.

THE GREAT ENGRAVING.

The public feel curiosity and interest about the engraving of the last General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Some of them have already subscribed for it, and many others intend to do so. The question is frequently asked—when will it be finished? "I am painting for immortality!" said the celebrated artist of antiquity, in reply to an expression of wonder and impatience at the slow progress of his work. "Festina lente"—make haste, slowly—must be the maxim of every man who undertakes a great enterprise.

There will be no unnecessary delay, kind patrons; and the months expended in perfecting your picture will ensure to your advantage. You desire an accurate, life-like representation of every member of that large body, and such an elegant engraving as will be worthy of the costliest frame, and yet will be an ornament to the parlor or the study in a cheaper frame; you wish a work which will go down as an heir-loom to your posterity, and keep before their minds the great and good men you admire and love, when they shall be resting from their useful toils, and others shall have entered upon the fruits of their labors. You may be sure of our eagerness for its completion at the earliest possible period; for we are burning with desire to erect at once the metropolitan church of Southern Methodism, and it would be far easier to raise the funds if we had the picture to show and deliver.

Not only is it a cause of deep and general interest to whose benefit this work is consecrated; but we furnish you with the most ample evidence that it will more than repay your generosity by its own excellence. SMITHSON, the proprietor of the work, from the most disinterested and intense zeal for our Church, sought the best artist into whose hands to commit it, and BUTLER was the man. Whether that choice was judicious, you may infer from the likenesses in the "Methodist Pulpit, South," which is lying—or ought to be—on your table. Butler seized the idea with enthusiasm. Here was an opportunity to gain for himself the widest and highest reputation in his branch of art. He saw the difficulty of the task. Two hundred persons must be put on one plate, and each must be a thorough likeness. No similar enterprise of an equal extent had ever been undertaken within his knowledge. He had, of course, seen engravings of the Senate of the United States. At our suggestion, he found a copy of the engraving of the Centenary of Methodism, an English work, representing the Legal Hundred of the Wesleyan Conference, in 1839. This excited his admiration, and fired his ambition to produce a work of double the magnitude, and of more elegant execution.

Thanks to the invention of daguerreotypes and photographs, it was a simple matter to get faithful likenesses of the men to be immortalized by art. A painter of skill was then employed to group them on canvas, so that they should show to the best advantage; there would have been too much sameness and tameness about the picture, and one row of faces would have been in danger of being obscured by another, had all been seated in order. Variety and life have been thrown into it, by selecting the moment when our old chief, Bishop Soule, with a form which, like that of Moses, age has not been able to bow, stands up to call the body to order. Secretaries are preparing for their duties; the reporter receives from the spruce sexton a glass of pure mother's ale, to moisten his throat before he enters on his task of committing to permanent record the evanescent words of excited speakers; members are seated or standing as they please.

The artist has taken some liberty with the hall. He will hang the walls with rich drapery, and with framed portraits of some of our noble dead, whose names are "familiar as household words" in our ears, and are written indelibly on our hearts. At the end of the hall, over the platform occupied by the bench of Bishops, is the most conspicuous portrait, JOHN WESLEY, looking down on this assembly of his sons, who meet to carry on the original mission of Methodism, to spread scriptural holiness through these lands; to whom they look up with reverence as their father under God, and with ever fresh kindling of zeal to imitate his example. Did he not from his lofty seat in heaven look down with interest on their deliberations, and rejoice in those grand schemes of usefulness which they projected?

To return to the picture. There is Charles Wesley, the sweet singer of Israel, whose songs are surpassed only by those of the redeemed around the Throoo; he may be a leader of that choir, and stand by the side of David with his harp, for aught I know. There is Dr. Coke; not only our Bishop, but first in rank among the missionaries of Methodism. We need such a spirit now, to plan and execute great things according to our men and means, and the openings of providence, for heathen lands. There is Asbury, that faithful, indefatigable, self-sacrificing wise man, who did and bore so much for American Methodism. We cannot honor his memory too highly; he was an apostle in truth. Of him, as of Paul and of Wesley, let it be written, "In labors more abundant." There are McKendree, Roberts and Emory, Bascom and Capers. The memory of these sainted fathers is precious to all our people, and will be to their children's children down to the latest generation. I have already mentioned our senior Bishop as standing on the platform among his colleagues, the most conspicuous figure among the living, as John Wesley is above the living and the dead. Andrew, Paine, Pierce, Early and Kavanaugh are all there, natural as life.

How shall I attempt to describe the multitude below? They are too many to be particularized; if I signalize a few, the selection might seem invidious. There is not one of them without a large circle of admirers and friends, who will prize highly his likeness; and there are not a few who are loved throughout the land for their genius and their works. I know this to be the venerable Dr. Pierce, though I have never enjoyed the pleasure of seeing him, from his engraving in the book of sermons. I was conversing with that great orator, Wm. C. Preston, about our illustrious preachers in the South, and spoke with enthusiasm of Bishop Pierce;

"Yes," replied he, "Bishop Pierce is a great preacher, but we old men think his father a greater."

Yonder, I am told, is Dr. Drake. Nobody need point him out to a citizen of Mississippi. Why did not my annual Conference send me to the General Conference at Nashville, so that I might have seen all the good men from every part of our territory, and been able to identify them in the engraving? Well, if I did not go myself, I will rejoice in the honor of my classmate, Josephus Anderson, whose youthful face I see among older heads. He and I started together in the itinerancy; but his health demanded a more genial climate, and Florida honors her adopted son.

Here is a noble face and brow which I know well, which are imprinted on my heart! Under his ministry my father now in heaven, was brought into the church. Years passed away, and again Dr. Smith was stationed in Norfolk. He now received the son, as he had the father, into the fellowship of saints. Not long afterwards, he was my President, professor, friend, at Randolph-Macon College. Time rolled on, and I was an inmate of his house during two years chaplaincy at the college. During my childhood, boyhood, youth, manhood, I have known him. In private and social intercourse, in the lecture-room, at the altar, around his own hearth, where his loved ones gathered, and around the graves where they now sleep, I have communed with him freely as a son with his father. And all this familiarity has only served to ripen admiration into reverence and love for his great intellect and greater heart.

There sits the first of preachers, in my estimation, Dr. Doggett. I inherited affection and admiration for him, when scarcely able to talk. I tried to preach like him—after years have taught me the hopelessness of the ambition. With these two eminent ministers of the Virginia Conference, I ought to mention another, who has transferred his labors to another field, bearing with him our affections and prayers—Dr. Wadsworth. He was my pastor the two years preceding his removal to LaGrange. It will belong ere the people of Norfolk, without distinction of denominations, forget those years. This trio I knew in my boyhood, because I sat under their preaching and often saw them at my father's house. Yonder stands one whom in those early days I had not seen or heard, but whom I had a strong desire to see and hear. I knew him from his editorials. I remember well how I used to search the Advocate for controversial articles, they were so spicy; I loved a hard blow at our ecclesiastical opponents more then than I do now. Last November Dr. Lee bade adieu to the chair editorial, and is now engaged with energy in presiding over the Norfolk District.

I am becoming too garrulous for my years. I must not pause to describe Edwards, Rowzie, Bennett, Davis, Carter, Rosser—Michaels is not here yet. The editorial corps is largely represented. This, I am told, is Brother Gillespie, of the New Orleans Advocate; that, McTyeire, of the Nashville. Myers, of the Charleston, sits at the Secretary's table, by the side of Summers, of the Quarterly. Here also are Watson, of the Memphis, and McAnally, of the St. Louis. Here stands an ex-editor and the present book agent, Dr. McFerrin, with a face expressing energy and good humor; he "laughs at weddings, and cries at funerals." There sits a prospective editor, Dr. Marshall, of the Church Evangelist. I had the pleasure of hearing a capital sermon from him recently, in this city. He says that the engraving should be sold at fifty dollars instead of ten, and that we ought to have a noble church at the metropolis by all means. Yonder is another editor whose acquaintance I made not long since, Huston, of the Visitor and Home Circle. I see Dr. Hamilton, of Alabama; Winfield, of Ouachita; Field and Kelly, of Western Virginia; Deems, Closs, Heflin and Reid, of North Carolina. I believe that I have mentioned all with whom I am personally acquainted.

"This is a man after my own heart," said Mr. Smithson the other day, as a good brother from South Carolina, who happened to be in Washington, laid down the cash for the book and the engraving. If our friends who wish to help us will send on the money in advance, they will put us under obligation by their kindness, and in due time they shall receive an engraving superior to anything of the kind on which their eyes have ever looked.

THE HEROIC AGE NOT PAST.

BISHOP AMES, at the recent session of the New England Conference, used the following language:

"I sometimes fear an error is creeping into our thoughts; we often hear that the heroic age of Methodism is past, and that now has come an age of peace and plenty. This is not wholly true. I have indeed sometimes wished that you who labor in these lovely New England valleys, and in these beautiful and thickly strown villages and cities, might be with me a short time on our frontier. It happened to me in 1857 to attend a series of Conferences extending all along from the Red River country in Texas to Fon du Lac in Wisconsin. Thus in the short space of two months I enjoyed a view of that vast frontier, where the foundations of social order are laid, and where in a few years the present thousands will have become millions! And need I say that it was with the profoundest gratitude to God that I saw the Methodist Church permitted pre-eminently to take the lead, and lay the foundation of the Christian Church in those lands? But, brethren, this is not accomplished without toil. The horse and the saddle-bags are no myths there. What your fathers talk about, what you read of in the life of Jesse Lee and other New England pioneers, there you may see, with some slight variations. There streams are forded, the wilderness threaded, and as the tide of civilization advances with a regular swell about eighteen miles a year, Methodist ministers are found on the crest of the wave, pointing the pioneers to heaven and consecrating parents and children to God.

"It has not pleased God to call you to labor in such a field, and yet I am not prepared to say but that greater trials are yours. It is sometime said the fathers had greater trials than you. I cannot adopt the opinion. I have had opportunity to observe. In my present labors I have travelled in our own church more than enough to go around the earth three times, and it is my honest opinion that the labor of laying the foundation of the church is not so great as that of building it up. Here and now the toil is chiefly mental. Care and study are required. I have always thought that from your peculiar circumstances great heroism and special grace are demanded by the Methodist ministers in New England. But when we look at fifty years ago and the present, we have reason to thank God and take courage."

A CHAPTER ON THE VALUE OF GOOD BOOKS.

"Binney's book of Christian Experience," an old tattered volume, picked up at random by Baxter, awakened him to strong convictions of the evil of sin, and he finally found peace and hope in the perusal of "Libbs's Bruised Reed."

His "Call to the Unconverted" awakened and saved Phillip Doddridge.

Doddridge wrote his "Rise and Progress," the reading of which, lead Wm. Wilberforce to Christ. Wilberforce wrote the "Practical View," a copy of which being put into the hands of Leigh Richmond, while yet a stranger to the life and power of the Gospel, he was then preaching, brought him to seek for mercy at the cross of the Savior. "The Dairyman's Daughter," written by him, has contributed to the salvation of thousand of souls.

Thomas Chalmers, too, became the spiritual son of Wilberforce, by reading his "Practical View," while preaching an unknown Christ.

A poor sailor, who afterward became a fervent Christian and successful preacher, author of many books and hymns, the use of which are co-extensive with our tongue—the Rev. John Newton, was reclaimed from his vices by the recollections of his pious mother's counsels, and the reading of religious books. This man was the means of the conversion of Claudius Buchanan, so distinguished for his labors the East Indies; and the "Star of the East" a book published by him, first called the attention of Judson to the missionary work, and sent him to Burmah.

This sailor turned preacher was also the means of delivering the Rev. James Scott from the mazes of ruinous error, and of introducing him to the "Way, the Truth, and the Life." Mr. Scott prepared the commentary known by his name, which still continues its mission of converting and sanctifying power.

Who can tell the value to the cause of God and good of men of the writing of good books?

NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE ON SLAVERY.—The New England conference, on the 9th inst., by a unanimous vote, in a full session, adopted a resolution recommending the change in the General Rule, proposed by the Providence conference, viz, that it may read thus: "Slave-holding; buying or selling men, women or children, with an intention to enslave them."

EPISCOPAL ITEMS.

The Editorial correspondence of the Memphis Advocate says: "Bishop Soule has just come in where I am writing. He is much better, he says, than he has been; but has been much shaken with chills of an extraordinary character, lasting about four hours." He is, or will be, 77 years old the 1st day of next August. Sixty years ago, the 5th day of last January, he left his father's house and went to a circuit and has been "at it ever since," until recently. It cannot be long until our senior Bishop will leave us. Not a single preacher in the connection now in the Church, who was effective when he became one, who is now alive. Not one, dead or alive, who traveled so much as he has done in the Church.

"We took Bishop Paine on board at Iuka. He looks badly. He tells me he weighs twenty pounds less than he has in twenty years. At Stephenson we met with Bishop Early, who is in fine health and spirits. He has fully recovered from his affliction under which he was laboring when with us last winter. Bishop Andrew will not arrive, it is said, until Monday, as he spends the Sabbath in Murfreesboro. Bishop Pierce will not be here, having started to California about a week since. The probability is that our next annual Conference will be held in Memphis. We voted, by a large majority, to hold our next session there. Having learned, however, that it was very desirable on the part of the people of Aberdeen, Bishop Paine and Bro. Crouch, to have our Conference there just before the Conference adjourned, we reconsidered the vote, and by acclamation voted to go to Aberdeen. Bro. Blackwell wrote me a few days since that they could not get their Church ready, and that there was no other Church in the place that would much more than hold the preachers, and that in view of all the circumstances, they thought it the better plan to hold our next session in Memphis. Bishop Paine will write an article setting forth the reasons for this change more in detail through the columns of the Advocate.

"The Bench of Bishops, I hope, will at least get on far enough for me to telegraph to you the time of our Conference and who will be our presiding officer, for our next issue. If I were to turn Yankee and "guess," it would be Bishop Andrew, who will, I think, have to take the "outside row," now that Bishop Pierce has gone to California."

Bishop Andrew ought not to take the "outside now," according to our judgment. His health does not justify the appointment. [Ed. N. O. Ch. Advocate.]

A DISTRICT MEETING.

At a meeting of the preachers of the Summerfield District of the Alabama Conference of the M. E Church, South, called by the Presiding Elder of the District, in the M. E. Church, in Selma, April 15, 1859 there were present the following:

J. W. Starr, P. E.; Edward Wadsworth, Selma Station; F. T. Brendon, Montevallo Station; G. W. Brown, Columbiana Station; J. L. Cotton, Cahaba Station; T. F. Green, Autaugaville Station; J. T. Talley, Shelby Coal Mining Mission.

The P. Elder being in the chair, J. L. Cotton was elected Secretary.

The chairman stated the object of the meeting was to inquire into the spiritual condition of the Church, consult about the best mode of promoting its edification in godliness, and to secure uniformity in the administration of discipline.

The following resolutions were adopted and directed to be published in the New Orleans and South Carolina Advocates:

Resolved, That, being deeply impressed with the very defective manner in which ecclesiastical records have been kept upon our various charges, we will secure substantially bound blank books for each Church, in which we will enter a history of said Church up to the present time, and in which, henceforth, we will preserve a faithful journal of all our ecclesiastical transactions; entering particularly the Minutes of all our Church trials, and also, a biographical notice of all who die in the faith.

Resolved, The we believe that members of the Church under censure, ought not to be allowed to withdraw from the Church, leaving the same record as members withdrawing in good standing, and that whenever a member, under censure, wishes to withdraw, it would be well to prefer his request to the official Board, who may decide upon it, and what record shall be retained upon the Church journal in the case.

Resolved, That we request the preachers upon the District to read in all the societies, Mr. Wesley's "Advice to the people called Methodists, with regard to dress," New Works, Vol. 6, p. 545.

Resolved, That we deeply regret the neglect of many of our members in attending Class-meetings, and we, believing that their delinquency generally arises from deficiency in religious experience, will labor to form in their minds a due appreciation of their value for edification, and to secure their attendance thereon.

Resolved, That the P. Elder be requested to see that the preachers read the General Rules in all the societies.

J. W. STARR, Chairman.
JAS. L. COTTON, Secretary.

DEATH OF REV. FRANCIS M. CRAIN.

MR. EDITOR: Will you announce through the Advocate the death of Rev. Francis M. Crain, of the Alabama Conference? He died on the 18th inst, at the residence of Gen. John H. Cocke, near this place. During the last sixteen months I have been often with Brother Crain, and his spirit has ever been that of an humble, conscientious, and faithful Christian. He died in peace—just the death that is promised to the perfect and upright man.

On his death bed, his confidence was unshaken; no doubt disturbed his mind. At one time, when questioned by the writer as to his spiritual state, his answer was, "There is not a cloud, not a doubt." At another time his answer was, "That is all arranged; I attended to that years ago." His faith and hope were unwavering. I had the mournful pleasure of closing his eyes in death; and felt it to be a blessing to be with him at the time of his departure. Truly the dying room of a Christian is next place to heaven. W. SHAPARD.

CALVINISM.

The best argument against Calvinism is a simple, perspicuous, unglossed statement of it. The circulation of the Bible, "without note or comment," is its only needful commendation; the statement of Calvinism, "without note or comment," is its only needful condemnation. And the most mortal offence to Calvinism that can be committed, is, to quote from its advocates their strongest passages unshrinking it. Complaints are immediately made that it is misrepresented and persecuted. How it can be more misrepresented than by those who profess to uphold it, is hard to understand. Its substance is, that God made a portion of the human family on purpose to save them, and does save them—without responsibility on their part; and that he made the other portion of the human family on purpose to damn them, and does damn them—without responsibility on their part. And yet this is most vehemently denied, and the freedom and responsibility of each human being asserted; while Arminianism is condemned as the doctrine of devils, simply for maintaining the same thing—namely, the freedom and responsibility of each human being.

IS A BISHOP NECESSARY.—The California Christian Advocate is considering the question, whether their Conference shall instruct the President at the next session to ordain candidates for Deacon's and Elder's orders in the absence of a Bishop.

STATISTICS OF POPULATION AND RELIGION.

The director of the Statistical Bureau of Berlin furnishes the following curious statement: "The population of the whole earth is estimated to be 1,288,000,000, namely: Europe, 272,000,000; Asia, 755,000,000; Africa, 200,000,000; America, 59,000,000; and Australia, 2,000,000. DEATH OF REV. WILSON L. McALISTER.

Dr. McFerrin writes to the Nashville Christian Advocate: A letter from the Rev. J. W. P. McKenzie, dated April 1, brings the sad intelligence that our old and long-tried friend, the Rev. Wilson L. McAlister, is no more. He died at his house on the 30th ult. Brother McAlister was presiding elder of the Choctaw District, Indian Mission Conference; his family residing in Texas, near the Indian Territory line. I long knew Brother McAlister. He was one of my colleagues when young in the ministry; and I can truly testify that a more noble, generous-hearted, sweet-spirited Christian minister I never knew. O, Sir, I loved him as I love a brother; and I mourn as though a near relative had gone to the grave. He was a member of the last General Conference, and made my house his home. He endeared himself to all the members of my family, and when he bade us farewell, little did I think it would be our final adieu. But he sleeps in Jesus! My brother, thou wast pleasant to me! But the will of God be done." The family of our brother will have the sympathies of their numerous friends.

REFLECTIONS ON THE DEATH OF A FATHER.

BY G. T. V.

How mourns the heart over the remains of the departed dead! How agonizing the tearing asunder the cords of affection, knit in nature and nurtured by many years, kindness and love: and yet many of this class are daily experienced in this vale of tears.

The last summer will always be a memorable one to me, though sadly so. Years had passed away since I had seen my fond father; and, agreeably to his request, I consented to visit him in 1858. He wrote again, urged me to go on early. I obeyed him, and it was well I did; for had I tarried, I should never again have beheld my dear parent in the flesh.

Long had I been in the extreme South, endeavoring to call sinners to repentance; while my people reside in one of the middle States. My mother had died when I was too young to feel her loss; this being supplied by a kind and affectionate stepmother. I had really never known a heavy stroke inflicted by the hand of death. It remained for me to experience this, a few weeks after my arrival in my native State.

Having written to my dear parent, the time I was to start from the vicinity of New Orleans to visit him, he calculated so nicely as to meet me the very day of my landing, three miles from his residence, and conducted me home. Oh, what a thousand thoughts and remembrances crowded my mind as I approached my native shore; and as the steamer neared the wharf where were many persons crowding to receive their friends, how eagerly I scanned that company to view the well known features of my parent's face.

At length, a little back from the crowd, I espied him: I scarcely recognized him at first: his dark hair had become much grayer than when I last saw him, and his beard was almost white, giving him quite a different appearance from my last remembrance of him.

I soon jumped from the steamer and was by his side, and in a few moments I was on the road to the house; where I met my mother, sisters, brothers, and brothers-in-law, and thanked God for the precious boon and glorious privilege of being with loved ones again at home.

But how fleeting often are earthly joys. How truly has said the poet:

"We should suspect some danger nigh,
Where we possess delight."

In five short weeks my dear father had given me his blessing, and was in the spirit world. Faithfully did I remain by his side, till I was called off a few miles to preach; and it seems, that while I was delivering my message of salvation to dying men, my parent was dying, and proving the blessedness of the same gospel his son was proclaiming.

Oh how great was the mercy of God, in calling me to visit him at the time I did; and, yet to be so near him, and not to witness his parting hour, I could scarcely have reconciled to myself, had I been engaged in any thing else than my Master's work. So soon as I had finished the sermon, I was hurried to his bedside, but it was too late. He lay a pale and lifeless corpse—the shaft of death had pierced his bosom and he was gone to that "bourne from whence no traveler returns."

Oh the sadness of that hour—the deep, excruciating agonies of that scene—mother, sisters and brothers, all in anguish for the loss of one whose place can never more be filled, by aught of earthborn millions. And how, now, did the remembrance of every act of kindness from his tender hand come up, like so many floods, to swell the torrent of our grief.

My heart was touched as it had never been touched before: a cord was moved, that had hitherto lain dormant. I felt a mighty tie to the world was broken, and being loosened from the earth, it was fastened in the skies. I could not help feeling that he was not dead, but had simply gone on a journey, which we were all taking, and though he had gotten the start of us, we should soon overtake him. Heaven was brought nearer. Eternity was not so awful; and I ceased to look upon death with terror, because one I loved was dead.

Oh God! how sad and solemn was that hour, when we saw his body deposited in the earth. To give him we so much loved to worms and dust, was more than unassisted flesh could bear. But blessed be God, we grieved not as those without hope, for he had lived the life of a Christian, and died a Christian's death.

In the pleasant little town of Centreville, Queen Ann's county, Maryland, beside a cherub slab—bearing his own name and marking his own offspring—rises an humble marble with this inscription.

In memory of SAMUEL VICKERS, died July 11th 1858, aged sixty-five years and seven months and eighteen days.

He was a good citizen; an affectionate husband; an indulgent father, and a firm Christian.

"He is not dead but sleepeth."

MR. REED, late United States Minister to China, was in Paris at last accounts.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

DR. JEPTHA FOWLKS has reached our city, radiant with the glory of his great victory over all the enemies of the old Company of the Southern Pacific Railroad. The whole controversy which divided this company has been determined, and the party represented by Mr. Fowlks is in possession of all the titles, property, and franchises of the Company. The only cloud on their horizon, is the suit instituted by the State of Texas to forfeit the charter. This suit does not give the Company much anxiety. The Court, in the first instance, has decided against the claim of the State, on grounds which the lawyers considered impregnable. It has, I is believed been appealed, but the Governor, it is believed, will order it to be discontinued, when he learns that the dissensions and difficulties among the stockholders have been settled, and if he does not, the Supreme Court will maintain the non-suit. So there is not much to fear from that quarter. Certainly such a result as this is highly creditable to the energy, boldness and enterprise of Dr. Fowlks, who has been the champion and master spirit of the company in all these operations—this severe, laborious and vexatious war. The Doctor deserves a civic crown for such triumphs. [Delta.]

SECESSION.—We learn from the Northern Christian Advocate of the 6th inst, that small secessions in a half-a-dozen places in Western New York, have taken place, under what is called "Nazarite" influence. It is a matter unworthy of much notice. We are glad to see elements that cannot act harmoniously will the church in her great and good mission retire.

☞ We learn from the Advocate and Journal that the Newark conference, at its late session, adopted the Lagon resolutions in favor of lay co-operation.

MEMPHIS AND CHARLESTON RAILROAD.—It is stated on the authority of Colonel Samuel Tate, President, that the gross receipts of this road, during the eight months ending with 1st ultimo, amounted in round numbers to $952,000; expenses for the same time $352,000, leaving a clear profit of $590,000.

THE VICKSBURG DEPOSITORY.

MR. EDITOR—As it may not be improper, with your permission I will pen a few thoughts for the public eye, in reference to this Depository and a few side issues.

And to begin, I will say, that we have about the best selection of books in the South, selected from the Publishing Houses in Nashville, and from publishers North and East, a great variety. And if there was the unanimity in the Mississippi Conference for the Depository and its work, that there seems to be in some other Conferences, we might do a vast amount of good, by the blessing of God upon our labors. Yet we are at work, and doing something. But some one (or more it may be) is busily putting into circulation reports that are unfounded, untrue, and injurious.

One is, that we are going to fail; another, that we are bound to fail; another, that we have failed; another, that no dividend can be or will be filled; another, that we do not pay annuities; another, that we will not send books unless the money accompanies the order; another, that more than one-half of those who subscribed, or gave their notes for stock, have repudiated; that will not pay, and that the rest are afraid to pay; and so we are about to make a great fizzle of the whole affair, and disgrace ourselves, the Conference, and the Church—and much more of about the same stripe.

To ease some of their apprehensions; to gratify the desire which others may have to know; to relieve others who are anxious about our success; to correct false rumor, and set ourselves right before the people among whom these reports have been circulated; to encourage our friends, and to enlist all the preachers, I submit the following statement.

Under such circumstances as have pressed upon us, we have done better than the friends of the enterprise have believed we could, in sales, etc.

We have collected $15,875 on our stock, have about $7,000 notes and subscriptions regarded as reliable, and about the same set down as doubtful—not more than one-half or one-third of which may be realized; making about $23,075, stock realized, in money, and notes believed to be good; and a doubtful list of $3000. This should encourage the friends of the Depository to pay up their notes soon, at once, if they can. We hope they will.

Orders are filled with promptness and dispatch, so far as we have the books when they come. But we cannot insure that any book will be in the Depository which may be ordered by Brother, as the orders which may arrive in one day would require every such book, if not more. Yet we are exerting ourselves to keep on hand a large and well assorted stock of books which ranges from $10,000 to $15,000 in value. We are receiving books almost every week from the publishers at Nashville, New York, etc. We think that many would do well to send us for books—better, if they would do their best to sell them and get their people to read them. "My people are destroyed for the lack of knowledge," said God, by the mouth of the prophet. "Give attendance to reading," said an apostle.

None have failed to receive "annuities" who are entitled to them, except three brethren who wrote for such books as we did not have; we did not feel obliged to go out and buy books for that purpose.

The design of offering annuities was, to make so many agents of the shareholders, to put into circulation religious books and tracts: that they and their families might read them, and circulate them in their immediate neighborhoods. But somehow or other, some of them never seem to think of this when they order their annuities.

The object of the Society and Depository is, to do good by circulating religious books and tracts. These the shareholders are entitled to, as annuities; and with a little additional outlay of money, any one might obtain a supply of very good books in a few years—a library of standard works. One year, he might take Clarke's, or Benson's, or Henry's commentaries, and pay the difference in the price. The next, he might take Watson's Dictionary and Institutes, and some tracts. One year, he might select books suitable for his children.

The annuities were designed, again, to give us so many active interested agents, who would be scattered over a large territory of country, enlisted for the success of the enterprise. What an amount of good they might do, if they would exert themselves! How much information on religious subjects they might bring into their families and neighborhoods!

Arrival of City of Washington—4 Days Later from Europe

More Pacific Aspect—Decline in Cotton.

NEW YORK, April 25.—The iron screw-steamship, City of Washington, Capt. Petrie, arrived at this port this evening. She left Liverpool on Wednesday, the 13th instant, and her advices are four days later than were received by the Arabia at Halifax.

Cotton Market.

LIVERPOOL, April 13.—The sales of Cotton for the three business days since the sailing of the Arabia, amount to 21,000 bales. The estimated sales on Wednesday 6,000 bales. The market continues depressed, and Cotton has declined 1-16 to 1d. on the quotations by the Arabia. The decline is chiefly on inferior, although some authorities quote Middling Orleans at 1d. decline. Messrs. Ciaro end Son's circular quotes Middling—Orleans, 7¼; Mobile, 7¼; Uplands, 7d.

General Intelligence.

LIVERPOOL, April 13.—The political aspect of affairs on the Continent has assumed a less threatening appearance than was manifested at the departure of the Arabia.

During the early part of the week the rumors of impending war were of a very alarming character, but the latest advices from the Continent indicate a return to more pacific measures.

The armaments of France and Austria are still continued, but with less activity than has hitherto charectertized their movements, and there are now some indications that a Peace Congress will soon be convened.

Austria has proposed to the other great powers that before the assembling of a Peace Congress to discuss the Italian question, the belligerent powers shall, simultaneously, discontinue their armaments. To this proposition, France and the other powers have assented.

THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT.—In the British Parliament, the Ministry being requested to give some satisfactory statement in relation to the state of European affairs, with reference more particularly to the pending difficulties upon the Italian question, has promised to do so by the 15th of this month.

Parliament will probably be dissolved in about one week. The House of Commons has lately rejected a resolution which was offered in favor of voting by ballot, by a majority of three.

FRANCE.—The Paris Monitcur publishes another article in its official columns, of a conciliatory tone towards the German powers, repudiating the idea which appears to be entertained by them, that the Emperor has any intention of interfering with their independence.

Warlike rumors continue to be circulated from Paris and Germany.

PAUL MORPHY CROWNED.—Paris, April 13—Paul Morphy, the champion of chess, left Paris for England on the 9th inst., from wheace he expected shortly to sail for the United States.

Before leaving Paris, a complimentary diner was extended to him, which he accepted. St. Arnaut, a prominent member of the chess fraternity, presided. Legurne's bust of Paul Morphy was decorated and crowned with laurel, as a concession unanimously made by the assembly that he was the best chess player that ever lived.

Civil War in Mexico—A Terrible Chapter Opened.

By the Tennessee we have most exciting and important intelligence from the civil war in the interior. Miramon had successfully fought his way through to the city of Mexico, and the Liberal forces have been completely routed in a bloody engagement; the most unparalleled excesses have been committed. Americans and Englishmen, all apparently, indeed, who did not give in their adherence to the Church-military party, or who were marked in their opposition to it, have been massacred. Even attendants on the wounded in hospitals have been murdered in cold blood.

Just as the Tennessee was leaving port, an express came in from the capital with news to the 10th, confirming everything stated.

This express also brought intelligence that Ampudia, Traconis and Alatriste (the same vigilant generals who were to prevent Miramon's passage over the mountains) were following him up, and when the courier passed them were within twelve leagues of the capital. They are said to have 6000 men.

If this be true, the Liberalists may yet rally, but our correspondents do not seem to entertain such hopes. [Picayune.

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 25.—The splendid steamer St. Nicholas, Capt. McMullen, of the New Orleans and St. Louis line of packets, met with a terrible disaster last night, by the explosion of one of her boilers. The explosion occurred at about 10 o'clock, at Island Sixty; and, as far as has yet been ascertained, forty-eight lives were lost and twenty-eight were badly scalded or wounded.

The St. Nicholas was on her way from St. Louis to New Orleans with a large number of passengers and full of freight. The explosion occurred about 45 miles below this city, and about half way between here and Helena.

The steamer Susquehanna, from New Orleans, which arrived here to-day, brought up the first intelligence of the disaster, and also brings a large number of the killed, wounded and saved. The boat and cargo are a total loss.

The above named persons saved were brought to this city by the steamer Susquehanna, Capt. C. Williamson.

The Susquehanna also brought up sixteen of the unfortunate sufferers, who are shockingly wounded, by being scalded or mangled by the explosion.

These unfortunator sufferers have been placed under the care of the city authorities and our benevolent societies, and every attention and care will be bestowed upon them to relieve their sufferings with the aid of the best medical attendance.

The passengers of the St. Nicholas who were brought up on the Susquehanna, speak in high terms of Captain Williamson's conduct and of the kind attention they received from all on board the Susquehanna.

The Sickles Trial.

WASHINGTON, April 25th.—In the trial of Sickles for the murder of Key, the session to-day has been occupied by the closing arguments of counsel, which had not concluded when the court adjourned.

Mr. Brady finished his closing argument to-day. His address was an eleberato production. He argued at great length upon the instructions to the jury, and endeavored to show that Key and not Sickles fired the Derringer pistol.

Mr. Guild, the District Attorney, made the closing argument, when the court adjourned.

Later and Important from Utah.

LEAVENWORTH, K. T., April 25.—The Utah mail arrived here to-day, with later advices from Salt Lake City. The advices represent the Territory in a very threatening aspect.

The United States Court have been unable to administer justice. The Grand Jury refused to find bills, and used other means to screen the murderers of Potter and Forbes.

Judge Cradlebaugh had discharged the Grand Jury, and also the Traverse Jury; and one thousand U. S. troops had been marched from Camp Floyd, and encamped near Provo, where the court was in session.

Governor Camming apparently favors the Mormon sentiment. A collision between the troops and Mormons is considered imminent.

River Intelligence.

MEMPHIS, April 25,—The river at this point is falling slowly. The water is now fourteen and a half inches below the highest point to which it rose last year.

ST. LOUIS, April 25.—The river at this point has fallen two inches during the past twenty-four hours, and is still falling slowly.

LOUISVILLE, April 25.—The Ohio river at this point is rising with eleven feet of water on the Falls, and thirteen and a half feet in the Canal.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Outrage on an American Citizen.—Reclamation of $500,000.

MINATITLAN, MEXICO, April 7, 1859.

Last night there came to the hotel where I am stopping two men, whom I set down in my mind for traders from Tobasco, who brought with him a very heavy trunk, and this I filled with "grand cash," and flattered the mercantile community with much trade. These gentlemen are still here, but they are not come for barter—they are refugres from oppression, and their case appeals to the people of the United States for redress. I say they need redress, but in this there is a distinction—both need it, but one demands it. One is a countryman of this distracted State, the other belongs to the American Republic. And I mistaken in believing that both these men stand on the same actual footing—that both of them must go without redress. If so, the Mexican is to be envied, for although he is now despoiled and a wanderer, he has no hope but in his own resources, for it would be useless in him to apply to his Government for redress. Therefore he will turn at once to rebuild himself, and will not waste his time in vain efforts to catch from Government that reparation he ought to have. On the contrary, the American will at once set to work, have his losses made good though diplomatic efforts, and although he is now full of faith and hope, I see him, in my imagination, after many years, worse off than the Mexican, still asking for justice for the wrong that has been done to him.

The circumlocution office is a woful canker-worm, and many are the hearts it needs must feed on to keep body and soul together. Just think what a turmoil Washington would be in if the secretaries and clerks of departments there should be kept out of their monthly pay for one whole year; and then think what immense suffering and anxiety are caused in the land because those well fed clerks and secretaries hold back the acknowledgment of the governmental debts. Poor McKenny; you have many years to wait before justice will waken from her inerth at Washington City. But to the particulars of the case.

Dr. J. G. McKenny's Statement.

I am a native of the State of Virginia and my family live in Richmond. I left the United States in 1834, (25 years ago,) for the purpose of exploring the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, Central and South America. Taken with a fever at Tabasco, in the Department of that name, I was directed into the interior as the safest and surest cure. Crossing the Cordilliera, I arrived in Comiton, a town midway between the Gulf and the Pacific, where I liked the climate, but where the fever prostrated me so that I was confined to my bed for three months. The inhabitants proved hospitable, and after I had recovered, they pressed me to remain. Establishing a drug store in the town of Ciudad Real, which was then the capital of the province, I did well and accumulated a large fortune. When the war with United States broke out, the Government troops attacked and robbed me of all my movable property, but left my houses. I was then married to the daughter of the Governor of the State, Senorita Monuitgoes. I removed to the town of Comitan after my disaster at Ciudad Real, and again commenced business as a merchant.

The first robbery of my property only inspired others, for although I made reclamations to the amount of $25,000, the claim was overlooked by the United States Commissioners, through neglect of my attorney, Mr. Cox. The instrument of the first robbery was an officer of the Customs under Santa Anna, named Jean Ortega, but who was subsequently discharged from his position as a defaulter. Ortega has always detested the American or foreigners, and since his discharge from the Custom-House, he has annoyed my property in every possible way. Since the revolution of Zoloaga, he has been acting under a commission from the Church party. But his main dependence is on the President Carrera, of Guatemala.

Without particularizing the exactions imposed upon me, I shall come down to the latest and greatest robbery, and the one for which I shall make my compliant for reclamations before the American Minister at the City of Mexico.

On the night of the 20th of January last, at about 4 o'clock in the morning, an alarm was raised in the public square of Comitan, by the firing of shots and the screams of the affrighted people running in every direction. Rushing into the street, I found a rabble soldiery breaking into my stores—a long line of which fronted on the public square. Every thing valuable was taken and fire was then applied, amid the cries, "Death to the Americans—Live the Church and its Privilges." (Muerto a los Americanos—Viena la Iglesia y su Privirlegeo.) With difficulty myself and family escaped through the back gateand proceeded to the house of a friend. The Centralists remained in town until 10 A. M., parading the streets with the banners of Guatemala and those of Mexico mingled together, and on each of them was written in Spanish, "The Church and its Privilges."

The people of Comiton rallied and drove the Centra lists, and (for the Department of Chiapas is Liberal in its politics) by midday I was allowed to visit the ruins of my property. But everything was destroyed. The work of twenty-five years was robbed, or burned to the ground. I could do nothing but collect a few debts, relying upon my Government to exact reparation from Mexico for the injury done me. I shall proceed to lay my claim before Mr. McLane, the Minister, and then I shall proceed to Washington City to put the Government in possession of the facts. I estimate my losses at $500,000. [N. O. Crescent.]

The Mission to Paraguay.

Commissioner Bowlin has addressed a long letter to the President of the United States, in which he gives a detailed account of the mission to Paraguay and its success. After some preliminary difficulties he proceeded to Asauncion, which he reached on the 14th of January, where he had an interview with the President. The effect was conciliatory, and several subsequent interviews took place. Judge Bowlin proceeds:

"Finally it was proposed that our next interview should be held in presence of General Urquiza, General Guido, his minister, and Sr. Amarol. I promptly accepted. When we met, no one but General Urquiza and his private secretary was present. We commenced the discussion of the points of difference, one by one, and as we settled them, they were reduced to writing. We then drew up an agreement, which was signed by the President and myself. This was the crowning glory of the whole affair, and in the general joy over it General Urquiza embraced President Lupez.

By the settlement, we make a new treaty, with changes liberalizing it; a convention to settle the company's claims; ten thousand dollars to the family of the sailor who was killed on the Water Witch; receive a satisfactory letter of regrets and apology for this affair and the treatment of the Government agents, with full permission to explore all the rivers."

We may infer from the foregoing, that the trouble with Paraguay is fully and finally adjusted. The inhabitants are said to be a simple, inoffensive people, and remarkably neat and clean in appearance. The market place in the morning presents a spectacle of nearly a thousand women, all dressed in pure white, and barefooted. The government is of the cheapest character, and the inhabitants amount to about 600,000 in all. Most of these are Indians of the Guaranneo race, who were civilized under the rigid rule of Jesuits. Judge Bowlin concludes as follows:

The real secret of Paroguay's apparent prosperity in contrast with her neighbors (for it would not do to contrast her with a progressive people,) lies in the fact of her exemption from revolutions. For this exemption she is indebted to the bloody rule of Doct. Francis, who left few ambitious aspirants behind him to contend for empire.

This Republic contains about eighty thousand square miles, a little larger than one of our larger States. It is almost surrounded by water, like an island, and the rivers deep and navigable. In soil and climate it is one of the most charming spots in the great valley of the La Plata, a valley equal in size to the great valley of the Mississippi. It lies in this valley, geographically, just as Missouri does in the valley of the Mississippi, only a warmer climate, as is general in this country. The time must come when these vast plains of the La Plata must cease to be mere grazing grounds for innumerable herds of wild cattle, and in turn become the seat of a mighty empire.

These rivers certainly have no rivals on the globe. The main trunk is a fresh running stream with a distinct current, where it is fifty miles wide and neither bank in view; and this branch, twelve hundred miles from the sea, except on the bars, is from twenty to sixty feet deep, and is but one of the three principal branches.

LOCAL.

Bonnet Carre Crevasso and the Jackson Railroad.

We have been informed by Prof. Riddell, who returned last evening from an excursion up the Jackson Railroad, that the crevasso water from Bonnet Carre had risen one inch and a half at the Frenier Station, in the preceding twenty-four hours. Turbid river water first shows itself on the further side of the prairie, nineteen miles from the city. There the top of the rail is about thirty inches above the water. At mile board 23, one mile this side of Frenier, the top of the rail is near fifteen inches above the water; at and above Frenier, it is near two feet, and as you pass mile board 27, you lose all trace of Mississippi water. A strong current runs through Bayou La Branche (20 miles from the city) and all the open crib work and culverts beyond, until you pass mile board 23. The adjacent margin of Lake Pontchartrain is turbid with crevasse water; and so likewise, Lake Maurepas and the passes. Prof. Riddell is of opinion that water will not rise high enough to cover the track, or impede commerce—and that it cannot do any material damage to the road; because the great Bonnet Carre Crevasse of 1850, a mile wide and 5 to 10 feet deep, raised the level of Lake Pontchartrain only a foot or fifteen inches, and there is said to be no probability that the present crevasse will attain one-fourth of these dimensions; and the Railroad fortunately is near the Lake, with open crib work for some miles in the neighborhood of Bayou La Branche. Moreover, Lake Maurepas is already freely receiving the flood, and its passes are so wide, and the adjacent swamps low, that it cannot easily be raised to a dangerous high. Should the crevass compare in magnitude with its predecessor of 1850, that part of the road near Frenier which has been embanked, may be submerged; and a temporary submersion might occur, under the influence of a strong Southeast gale.—Bulletin.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, April 26, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 23d inst.:

The week's operations have been to a fair extent in some departments of our markets, though it will be seen that our leading staple, Cotton, has moved but slowly, the very full prices claimed in the early part of the week, and the adverse European advices since received, having tended to check the operations of purchasers. In Tobacco there has continued to be a fair degree of activity, and with reduced supplies, advanced rates have been obtained for Sugar and Molasses, but only a moderate movement is observed in the various articles of Western Produce.

On Wednesday the Arabia's advices, from Liverpool to the 9th instant, one week later than those previously to hand, were before the public, reporting a moderate business in the Liverpool Cotton market, the week's sales being 33,000 bales, the quotations given are the same as those brought by the previous steamer, viz: 8¼d for Fair Orleans and 7¾d for Middling ditto, though the latest accounts state that the market closed dull, with a declining tendency. The whole stock at Liverpool was stated at 370,000 bales, of which 310,000 bales were American. The advices from Manchester and other manufacturing districts were more favourable, the week closing with a good demand and firmer prices. At Havre the market was steady, tres ordinaire being still quoted at 107 francs.

The weather during the past week has been generally clear and pleasant, with a copious shower of rain on Thursday night.

The river is above the highest mark of last season, and numerous crevasses are already reported in the Cotton and Sugar regions.

COTTON.—A material check had been given to operations by the advanced rates claimed by factors at the opening of the week, and the sales of the first three days of the week hardley reached 13,000 bales, the European's advices being to hand on Monday. On Wednesday the market wore a very quiet appearance and hardely 3500 bales were disposed of, with the Arabia's advices, one week later, to hand about noon. On Thursday, later and more full particulars of the Arabia's advices were before the public, and being unfavorable in their tenor, our market was brought nearly to a stand, only a few buyers coming forward, who took barely 2000 bales, in several small lots, at irregular and generally easier prices. Yesterday being a legal holiday (Good Friday) the Banks and offices generally were closed, and very few buyers came forward, the sales hardley reaching some 1200 bales; making a total for the past three days of 6700 bales, and for the week of 19,700 bales; the receipts, during same period, 20,820; and the exports, 58,083; Stock, in Presses and on shipboard, on 22d inst. 262,950 bales. With respect to prices, we have to state that there has really been no market for two or three days past. The Arabia's advices, particularly in their political aspect, appear to have inclined many parties to withdraw until further advises, while most of those disposed to operate are lower in their offers than holders generally are willing to submit to. Under these circumstances the few sales made within the last day or two have been at irregular and generally easier rates, but they are too unimportant to establish a market, and we retain previous quotations, with the remark that they are mostly nominal at the moment.

The receipts at this port since the 1st September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas) are 1,601,965 bales, against 1,428,932 bales to same date last year; and the increase in the receipts at all ports, up to the latest dates as compared with last year is 761,297 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 230,089 bales to Great Britain, of 45,542 to France, and of 207,755 bales to other foreign ports.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

IMPORTANT.

To every Preacher in Charge, in the M. E. Church, South:

MY DEAR BRETHREN:—I earnestly beg your immediate attention to a few points relating to our Sunday school work. The Discipline, (pp. 114—116,) makes it your duty—

1. To see that a Sunday-school be formed in every congregation under your care where ten children can be collected for that purpose.

2. To preach on the subject of Sunday-schools and religious instruction in each congregation, at least once in six months.

3. To lay before the Quarterly Conference, at each quarterly meeting, to be entered on its Journal, a written statement of the number and state of the Sunday-schools within your circuit or station, and to make a report of the same to your Annual Conference.

Please be prepared to report at the next session of your Annual Conference the Sunday-school statistics of your charge, under the following items, and in this order:

1. The number of schools.
2. The number of officers and teachers.
3. The number of volumes in their libraries.
4. The number of Sunday-school Visitors taken.
5. Amount of money raised for Sunday-school purposes.
6. Amount of money raised by Sunday-schools for benovoleat purposes, i. e., to aid other schools, for missions, etc.
7. The number of conversions of Sunday-school scholars during the year.

The General Conference has requested you to take up a collection in all your congregations, once a year, in aid of the funds of the Parent Sunday-school Society. Will you please do this as early as practicable, and send the money to Dr. J. B. McFerrin, Nashville, Tennessee. He is the Treasurer of the Sunday-school Society of the M. E. Church, South.

If you can form a new Sunday-school in any place where the people are too poor to pay for a library, send on to Dr. McFerrin the name and place to which it should be directed, and one will be sent gratuitously. Of course, our ability to do this will depend on the amounts received from other quarters.

Encourage every school within your charge to subscribe for the Sunday-school Visitor.

Six dollars will procure 30 copies to one address.

Ten dollars will procure 50 copies.

Twenty dollars will procure 100 copies.

This will cost the subscribers but twenty cents each, if they pay individually to make up the amount.

I shall be glad to hear from you at any time about your Sunday-schools. Write to me interesting or important facts, incidents, narratives of child-history, of conversions, of happy deaths, etc.; any thing bearing upon this great and blessed cause. Yours affectionately, CHARLES TAYLOR,

Cor. Secretary, S. S. Society M. E. Church, South.

Centenary College of Louisiana.

TO THE PUBLIC.—The undersigned, a quorum of the Executive Committee of Centenary College of Louisiana, would state that the Rev. VERNON H. JOHNSON, a member of the Mississippi Conference, is our agent for the College—to raise funds for building and endowment purposes—and that we cordially commend him, and the cause he represents, to the friends of Education and the public generally.

The Board of Trustees, have recently erected a large building, for College purposes, at a cost of 00,000; upon which a heavy balance remains unpaid. They wish to pay this debt, and to raise the endowment fond to at least $100,000. They know that the friends of education are able to do this, and they believe they are willing, and only wait the opportunity. Under these considerations, our Agent has gone forth, and from his present success, we feel confident that the work will be done speedily. Friends desiring to know our plan or to co-operate with us, can communicate with the Agent, Rev. V. N. JOHNSON, Cayuga Mississippi; or with Jone C. MILLER, Jackson, La.

THE DEATH OF ARIUS.

It was not intended that the Church of God should, while it is militant in this world, be at rest for long together. No sooner is it delivered from "fightings without," than it is exposed to "fears within."

When Constantine had come to the empire, and persecutions had ceased throughout the world, an enemy appeared in the bosom of the Church far more dangerous than any with which she had yet to fight. This was the heretic Arius.

Arius taught that our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, was not truly and really God. Those who had all their lives long been looking for and waiting for Him, calling on Him, believing Him to be their Pastors, their Sacrifice, their Redeemer, their exceeding great Reward, their Lord and their God, were filled with grief and horror that any one, professing to be a Christian, should dare to spread so blasphemous a doctrine. But there were not wanting those who upheld it, nor those who, by their teaching, were drawn away from the Truth.

At last the Bishops of all parts of the Church came together to determine this matter; and they met at Nice, in Bithynia. Here the wicked Arius was declared to be no longer in the Communion of the Church; and he, and all his followers, were delivered over to a solemn anathema. Then, too, it was that the Nicene Creed, nearly such as we have it in the present day, was drawn up, and declared to be the Faith of the Church.

One might have thought that Arius, finding himself thus condemned, might have repented of the evil of his ways; but, like all wicked men, he was the more hardened in his wickedness. He went on spreading his heresy wherever he could; he had several Bishops on his side; and at last the Emperor Constantine, the same who had seen the miraculous Cross, if he did not altogether become an Arian, thought that Arius ought not to have been cut off from the Church.

At this time, Alexander was Bishop of Constantinople. He was ninety years old, and had seen several persecutions of the Church, in all of which he had stood firm to the Faith. Now Constantine knew how much authority this good old Bishop had; and, smiling for him, desired him that, on a certain day which he fixed, he would receive Arius to his Communion. It was in vain that Alexander wept and besought the Emperor not to urge him on to so great a crime: in vain that he proved, by the clearest arguments, that Arius was a blasphemer. Constantine, who was not yet baptized, insisted, and the Bishop withdrew in the greatest grief. He came to his house, and called a Council of the Bishops and principal elders, who then happened to be in Constantinople, and they disputed much and long as to what was to be done. Some said that, considering all things, there would be no sin in receiving the Communion with Arius; some said that they would rather suffer martyrdom than do so; and the greater part were greatly afraid and distressed.

At last Jesus Nisibis rose and spoke thus: "My Fathers and Brethren, it has ever been the lot of the Church of God to derive best in the worst trouble; and ever a mark of the Children of God, then to bring forth most plenteously the fruit of good works when they were in the midst of affliction. Joh triumphed on a dunghill; the Three Children had no less a Companion than the Son of God in the midst of the burning fiery furnace; Paul and Silas sang praises in the dungeon; holy Martyrs have noble witness in the mouths of the lions, and Christ at the block. Wherefore, I am of good hope that out of our present danger our Lord, Who is our Only and Ever-living Head, will work out the good of His Church. But we have spoken too much to ourselves; we have gone about to persuade the Emperor with cunning words of human wisdom, and have therefore failed. Yet that which the Three Hundred and eighteen" (James meant the Bishops who were assembled at the Council of Nice, and who amounted to that number) "have decreed, that we steadfastly maintained, that the Son of God is of one substance with the Father, as we daily sing in our Church. Wherefore my counsel is, that we leave off from further disputes, which avail nothing, and commit ourselves wholly to God, seeing that it is written, "It is time for Thee, Lord, to lay to Thine Hand, for they have destroyed Thy Law." There took seven days to the time that this heretic is to be received into the Church; let us spend them in prayer and fasting; peradventure God will be gracious unto us, and deliver us from this great evil."

Then answered Alexander, "What your Blessedness" that was then the common title of Bishops) "hath said, is said well. This, also is my counsel: heretics may use persuasion and disputation; prayer and fasting are the arms by which Christians conquer."

All that week there went up an earnest cry to God from the Church of Constantinople, that now, if ever, He would make bare His holy arm: there was prayer to the Lord Jesus Christ, that He would rise, and plead His own cause, and remember how the foolish man blasphemed Him daily; there was prayer to the Holy Ghost, that He, Who had inspired the Fathers of Nice, would not forsake those who upheld what had been by them decreed.

And how did the Arians, pass the week? In feasting and revelry: their cause, they said, must be the cause of God, for the Emperor had approved it, and was all but victorious. Arius, now an old man, was caressed and praised by all, and his heart was lifted up within him.

It was on the Sunday that he was to be received to Communion; and already it was the Saturday. Arius had another audience of the Emperor, who professed to be well satisfied with him, and dismissed him with great honour. It seemed to his followers that all was safe; a few hours more, and they would have gained their wishes. And making a triumphal procession, they carried Arius through the city.

Still the Christians went on praying; they did not see whence help was to come; but they knew that with God nothing was impossible. Alexander, in his church, with two elders, continued instant in supplication; and, though they heard the shouts of their enemies, they were only stirred up to the greater fervency.

It was about three o'clock in the afternoon, and the procession had reached the Place of Constantine, the great square of the City. The countenances of the Bishops and elders who were with Arius, were flushed with their triumph; he himself looked pale and weary. He asked if there was no house where he could rest, and they showed him one into which he entered, and asking his friends to wait for him, said that he wished to be alone.

The crowd waited for some time, with patience; then people began to whisper to each other that the delay was very singular that something must be the matter—that they did not like the look of the affair. Presently the door of the house opened, and a deacon, who was of Arius's party, ran across the public place, the crowd making room for him, to the house of Caius Lavinius, a physician, who lived on the opposite side. Several men cried out, "What is the matter?" "Who needs the physician?" but no answer was returned; and the two entered the house together, and closed the door.

And now suspense and impatience rose very high; and a feeling of terror came over the multitude, as if some awful thing were going on within. In a few moments the physician came out, and said, "Good people, I advise you to go to your homes. Arius is dead."

The hereticleaf, indeed, perished by the visitation of God; and the spot of his death was long held accursed.

Then prayer triumphed; and Alexander, with a thankful, yet overwhelmed heart, celebrated the Communion with his flock on the following day.

The Best Sewing Machine.

Punch gives the following admirable description of an old fashioned sewing machine, which every bachelor should possess:

"The very best sewing machine a man can have is his wife. It is one that requires but a kind word to set it in motion, rarely gets out of repair, makes but little noise, is seldom the cause of dust, and once in motion will go on uninterruptedly for years, without the slightest trimming or the smallest personal attention being necessary. It will make shirts, darn stockings, sew on buttons, mark pocket-handkerchiefs, cut out pinafores, and manufacture children's frocks out of any old thing you may give it; and this it will do behind your back just as well as before your face. In fact, you may leave the house for days, and it will go on working just the same. If it does get out of order a little from being overworked, it mends itself from taking but alone a short time, after which it returns to its sewing with greater vigor than ever. Of course sewing machines vary a great deal. Some are much quicker than others. It depends a vast measure upon the particular pattern you select. If you are fortunate in selecting the choicest pattern of a wife—one, for instance, that sings whilst working, and seems to be never so happy as when the husband's linen is in hand—the sewing machine is pronounced perfect of its kind; so much so, that there is no make-shift in the world that can possibly replace it, either for love or money. In short, no gentleman's establishment is complete, without one of these sewing machines in the house!

What's in a Name.

The pronunciation of the Latin is lost with the song the sirens sang. Modern nations generally follow the best analogy of their languages. The Cicilians, for instance, pronounce what we call Cicero (as it spelled Sisero) Kikero, and the Italians pronounce it Chichero. The best rule is to adopt that style which is most familiar in the country where you are. If you spoke of Kikero in an Italian University you would not at first be understood, and when you were, you would be laughed at. And perhaps Cicero might laugh at all the Universities in Christendom if he heard them pronounce his name.

Yankeeism.

Sarah-hater writes an indignant note against the newspaper correspondents who gossip about the Princess Frederic William, and says in a postscript, "Suppose the interesting event doesn't happen?" The hypothesis is too late. The baby is born. And whenever a prince marries a princess, though he take post to Prussia and hide in rural castles, there will Jenkins be—studying the bride's blushes and the groom's honts, and putting his observations into touching epistolary forms for all mankind, which will devour them with the greatest relish.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

EXAMINING HEADS.

This business appears to be on the decline. It has been taken up by the fortune-tellers and clairvoyance people, and these vulgar charlatans are said to have ruined the trade of the "regular" manipulators. We are inclined to believe, however, that it has died a natural death. The phrenological charts sold at a dollar a piece by the "professors," and which purport to be perfect maps of the mind, have been discovered to be charts by which nobody can sail. Hence the demand for them has in a great measure ceased, and the rooms of the "professors" are no longer like barber-shops, with a customer in every chair, and four or five heads in hand at once.

There is, no doubt, some truth in the general principles of phrenology, but its details have never been satisfactorily verified. Gall and Spurzheim, the founders of the so-called science, and Combe, its most able illustrator and advocate, were undoubtedly men of philosophic minds and earnest, if not unprejudiced, searchers after truth. Yet the world at large has never been able to discover the remarkable coincidences between "bumps" and mental endowments, which these distinguished men insist upon. On the contrary, the daily experience of those who have looked into the subject with impartial eyes has been decidedly adverse to the minutiæ of phrenology. Hence its decline—for that it is declining, and will soon be shelved with "Lavater's Physiognomy," is beyond reasonable question.

THOU SHALT NOT KISS THE DEAD.

There died in Genoa an old man of the time-honored Jewish persuasion, who not alone left behind him an immense fortune, but also a character for extended benevolence. And the Israelites came from far and near to attend his funeral. And there were Rabbis of Geneva who made fine speeches, and there were Rabbis from other lands who spake also, and they all praised him who had now gone to sit in Abraham's bosom. Now there was one Rabbi from Calmar, in France, who opened his mouth wide in praise of the departed brother.

He spoke and said: "Twenty years ago, when I passed a poor, starving wanderer, through this town of Geneva, this good man lent me two hundred francs to ease my roegh road toward Calmar, and never to this day has he asked a farthing of the interest or capital of that kind loan. He will find his reward in Heaven. Hallelujah, amen."

Thus spake the Rabbi and departed again toward his home, with his beard wet with tears. But lo! when he arrived in the bosom of his numerous family there came to him a summons to appear before court. The heirs at law of the defunct Rothschild had a bill against him for two hundred francs, which he was obliged to pay. With many groans, he was compelled also to disburse compound interest for twenty years, and the tears which he shed were of no avail. The heirs brought the entire Jewish community of Geneva as witnesses of the debt, and thus came true the trite saying, "thou shalt not kiss the dead."

NOISES IN THE SICK ROOM.

It is extraordinary how many persons, unused to the sick room, mistake certain noises for quiet. When such people have to walk across the room they do so with a balancing sort of movement that makes every plank crick unusually. Their very dress rattles in a way that would make the fortune of a rattle snake. If anything has to be said, it is spoken in a loud whirring whisper, that conceals the words but makes the most irritating of noises. Now the silence of a sick room must not be labored, it must be natural. Shoes that do not creak must be worn, and in walking the foot must be put down carefully, of course, but with a firm step, that comes gently, yet steadily, on the floor. This will not make the creaking sound caused by the toe pointed, gingerly mode of movement so much adopted by those whose experience of sick rooms is small. The dress must be made of some noiseless material; wool er. cotton; silk must be avoided, for it squeaks with every movement. In speaking, the pitch of the voice must be slightly raised, and the words, instead of being hissed, as in whispering, should be clipped short, and cut distinctly. By this means the person spoken to will hear what is said, while the least possible sound accompanies the word. [Barnell's cure for the Sick,

SONS OF EMINENT MEN.

Sons of eminent men seldom amount to much, as they are generally content to inflate their souls with their fathers' greatness—which is very easily done. They are satellites which glow with a borrowed or reflected light, and when the source becomes extinct, and the light fades quite away, they are left in utter darkness. A transferred fame is not a substance but a shadow. Distinction must be wrought out; it never comes at a beck. True greatness never goes upon crutches; it is as independent as the nature of man will admit. Being well born gives great facilities for education and distinction, but it can never supply their place; they must be sedulously and wisely used, or poor advantages, well husbanded, will surpass them. Wealthy young men are apt to rely upon means rather than upon study. Poor young men, though they complain of their hardships, frequently discover that they were the incentives to whatever of eminence they have reached.

PHILOSOPHY OF ENDORSING.

One of the most sagacious and wealthy merchants was about to visit Europe, and setting his house in order before he left, closed a conversation with his son and heir as follows; "Now, as a lasting lesson, look at these four notes"—and he put into his hands four notes of hand of $25,000, making $100,000, with his name on the back. "Those," said he, "are the price paid for endorsing for a friend, I weakly put my name on them, and had to pay them as you see. Whenever any one asks you to endorse, look at those notes before you reply." [United States Economist.]

Obituaries.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. SUSAN J. FARR, aged 50 years, died at her residence in Holmes county, Mississippi, March 19, 1859. She was a native of North Carolina; emigrated to Alabama in 1831; thence to Mississippi, where she resided till her death. She embraced religion some twenty years ago, at a camp-meeting, and connected herself with the Methodist Episcopal Church at Emory, of which she has continued a consistent member. She loved the Church; believed in the doctrine of "a growth in grace;" her seat was always occupied at Class and other stated meetings. On one occasion she remarked—"I have been expecting this. But, thank God, I am prepared to go! I have examined myself on this well; I regret that I have not lived more devoted; but my way is clear. There is not a cloud between me and my God. All's well." Her pastor, Rev. T. Rayner, called to see her. She remarked, she had enjoyed great comfort in talking to Bro. Rayner; and wished she could see more of her brethere and sisters of the Church, that she might encourage them to be faithful. She had her children called around the bed, and imparted to them her dying blessing; exhorting each one to meet her in heaven. She appealed to the parents of her grandchildren, and besought them to raise their children for God and for heaven. She gave instructions respecting her burial; requesting to be placed in the church-yard, by the side of her husband, Wm. H. Farr, who died in 1849. X.....

REV. LANDON J. SCHOOLAR. This excellent and useful man was called from the labors and afflictions of this life on the 25th day of March, in the 49th year of his age, after an illness of about eighteen days. He was a native of Stafford county, Virginia, where, in his eighteenth year, he professed religion. He was licensed to preach in January, 1836; moved to Alabama in 1837; and from thence to this place in 1846, where he has resided, with the exception of about twelve months, till his decease. Bro. Schoolar was pre-eminently "zealous of good works," and seemed never so happy as when actively employed in doing good; few persons ever labored so much in a local sphere; and, indeed, his ministerial labors were even more abundant than many in the itinerancy. Nothing but the size of his family and his peculiar circumstances, prevented him consecrating all his time to the work of Christ. He labored several years in the employment of the Presiding Elder, as a missionary to the colored people, and one year as preacher in charge of the Columbus circuit, where his labors were greatly blessed, and his memory is fondly cherished by those to whom he ministered. At the Alabama Conference, held at Eutaw, in December, 1855, he was admitted on trial, and appointed to the charge of Prairie Hill circuit; but his health failed, and he was compelled to discontinue at the ensuing Conference. He was remarkably faithful in attending his appointments; and, in all respects, he was a consistent and devoted Christian. His death is regarded as a public calamity by the citizens of Columbus, and his funeral was attended by a large concourse of all ranks and classes, who thus gave testimony to his worth as a good and useful man. He was the friend of the colored man, and many tears were shed at his death by that class, who seemed to feel that they had lost a friend and benefactor. Death found him at his post, with his harness on; clothed in the panoply of God. Grace enabled him to triumph over the king of terrors; and he went down to the grave, in the full hope of the resurrection of the dead, and everlasting life. GEORGE SHAEFFER.

Columbus, Mi., April 8, 1860.

MRS. EMILY GREER, wife of Maj. John Greer, in the 45th year of her age, died of consumption, in the town of Homer, Louisiana, on the 19th March, 1859. Sister Greer was born in Morgan county, Georgia. In her seventeenth year she was most powerfully converted to God, while attending a camp-meeting in her native county. To say that Sister G. was an upright and consistent member of the church, would be paying but a feeble tribute to the memory of one whose whole life was consecrated to the high and holy principles of our blessed Christianity. Those who knew her longest and best, affirm that, during the twenty-eight years of her Christian warfare, not a day passed without affording fresh assurances of her entire readiness to meet death whenever the summons should come. Amidst the most violent paroxysms of suffering, she was filled with ecstacy of joy, exclaiming—"My blessed Savior endered greater peogs for me; and I'll gladly suffer all his righteous will!" Often would she desire us to sing—while her spirit, kindled by heavenly fire, would catch the inspiration of the song—and she would join the strain until her feeble voice was lost in joy and rapture unetterable. On occasions like these, she would earnestly exhort her friends and relations to set about the great work of their salvation at once; warning them of the dsegor of procrastination; and encouraging them, by narrating her own happy experience. A short time before her demise, her afflicted husband approached the bedside, and inquired if she knew him. Her reply was, that she did. Being then asked, if she knew her Savior, she exclaimed "Oh yes!" And then added, in the language of one of her favorite songs, "All is well!" An hour or two later, when the power of speech had left her, being desired, if she still saw her way clear and her faith was still streng, to signify it by raising her hand, she promptly lifted both as high as she could, repeating the signal twice or thrice; and presently fell asleep.

MRS. MARY GILLESPIE died at the advanced age of seventy-four, at her residence, near Belmont, Sumter county, Alabama, on the 19th February. The subject of this obituary merits more than a simple record, on account of her eminent piety and social virtues. Her maiden name was Mary Johnston, was born in Madison district, S. C., in the year 1785. In 1804 she joined the M. E. Church, at Georgetown, then in charge of Rev. James Mallard, whose memory was cherished by her with emotions of tender Christian regard as long as she lived. She was married to John McCree, of the same State, in 1805, with whom she lived in great domestic comfort till his death in 1813, when she was left a widow, with three infant children; all of whom, under her prudent training and the influence of her pious example, now occupy prominent and respectable positions in the church of her choice. In 1834 she removed to Alabama, and seven or eight years afterwards married her late, much esteemed husband, Joseph Gillespie. Just before her death she was heard frequently to say that for twenty-three years she had "uninterruptedly enjoyed the witness of her acceptance, through the atonement of Christ. Had not a doubt." Her death, though the result of gradual disease, was the calm and peaceful sleep of a Christian. A favorite expression with her towards the close of her life was—"I am a poor sinner, saved by the grace of God." With a modesty, befitting a mother in Israel, she requested, a short time before her death, that no ostentatious ceremonies should be paid her memory, after she was gone. W. H. ARMSTRONG.

MRS. MARY WILLIAMS died at her residence, in Lauderdale county, Mississippi, February 27, 1859, in the fifty-second year of her age. She was the daughter of David and Susan Hooks; was a native of N. Carolina; removed from that State some years after her marriage to Montgomery county, Alabama. The following year, she removed with her family to Sumter county; and thence, after the lapse of twenty-three years, (having lost her husband in the meantime) to the place of her late residence. She embraced the faith of the gospel, and joined the M. E. Church a number of years ago; and has lived an acceptable and consistent member thereof until removed by death, to her hulding of God; a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Her form of illness and manner of death forbade those utterances of Christian composure and triumph, which sometimes distinguish the closing scene of life. Her loved ones, and numerous friends, turn, with even sweeter assurance to the testimonies of faith and holy living given forth in health and amid the important duties growing out of the various relations of life. She leaves sorrowieg sons and daughters, whose exemplary and useful lives bespeek the guiding influence of her clear intellect and pure heart.

MISS MARTHA FRANCES BUFORD, daughter of John V. and Susan Buford, was born in Lunesburg county, Virginia, Nov. 25th, 1838, joined the M. E. Church and embraced religion in 1851, under the mialetry of Rev. L. M. Wilson, and died Feb. 22, 1859, in peace, and with a sure prospect of a home amoeg the blest on high. From the time of her connection with the Church to the day of her death, she lived a consistent life, and gave meey evidences of the geeaineness of her conversion to God; and, by her natural kindness and worm-hearted deposition, she drew around her many true friends, who now lament, with her deeply afflicted parents and relatives, her absence. O, may they all meet their blessed Martha in heaven—where she has gone to await their arrival. P. R. MCCRARY.

WILLIS ANDREWS, son of Rev. Samuel and Sarah Webb, died January 1, 1859, in the ninth year of his age. Loved so well, and yet so soon to pass away. Andrew, whose kind deportment, merry laugh, and sweet disposition, had gladdened the hearts of so many of his play-fellows; and whose obedience and love had won so upon the hearts, not only of his father and his father's family, but upon all who knew him—he was thrown from a wagon, and falling before it, both wheels passed over him. Afterwards he told his father that he was blind. His father stooping over him, asked him if he could not recognize him. After repeeting to his father, that he could not see, he clasped his arms about his neck, and calmly bade him goodby; and, with his expiring breath exclaimed, "Father, I love you!" O. P. MRS. ANN McGANTS died on 9th ult, in Wilcox county, Alabama. She was born in South Carolina, Oct. 20, 1774. She obtained religion, and joined the Presbyterian Church. In 1819, she removed with her husband to Wilcox county, Alabama; finding no Presbyterian Church convenient, she united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which she remained a pious and faithful member until her death. She was in her eighty-sixth year. In her last illness she suffered severely. She now rests from her labors and her works do follow her. She has left one son, who says, his last true friend on earth is gone. May the Lord bless him, and prepare him to follow her to that place, where there is no more death. ANSON WEST.

MRS. JEANNETTE COUCH, wife of J. W. Couch, Esq., was born near Richmond, Louisiana, March 23d, 1831, and died near Delhi, Louisiana, April 7th, 1859, aged 28; also, shortly after, her infant son. Mrs. C. was not a member of any branch of the Christian Church; but her consistent life and victorious death, evince to her surviving friends the power of Christ to save to the uttermost all who trust in him. Though not a church-member, she had frequently expressed a determination to unite with the people of God, at the earliest convenience. She leaves behind a devoted husband and four affectionate little daughters, together with a large circle of friends and relations, to mourn their loss. May the blessing of God attend the bereaved through life, and conduct them safely to heaven.

PREAMBLE AND RESOLUTIONS UPON THE DEATH EX-GOVERNOR T. M. TUCKER.

At a Special Communication of Bexar Lodge, No. 239 of A. F. M., held at Bexar, Marion county, Alabama, April 5, 1859, the following Obituary Resolutions were adopted.

WHEREAS, It having pleased our Supreme Grand Master to remove from the cares of this life, our highly esteemed and much beloved brother, T. M. TUCKER, Ex-Governor of Mississippi; who left his home in Louisiana, on a visit to his aged father, in Alabama; and has indeed proved a traveler to that undiscovered country, from whose bourne none ever return. It is with deep and unfeigned sorrow that we are called upon to record the death of Bro. Tucker; in which this as well as his own community have sustained the loss of one of its most gentlemanly citizens; and the Craft, a good and upright Mason. Though cut off from us and his family, yet we sincerely hope that he still lives in that temple, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, and his spirit has returned to God who gave it. We need words, however, in this preamble to express the heartfelt sentiments experienced by every member in this Lodge of so good a man. Therefore,

Resolved, That we are made to realise unfeigned sorrow by the death of Bro. Tucker; and, that we warmly sympathize with the aged father and family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the jewels of this Lodge be clothed in mourning, and the brethren wear the usual badge for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Secretary of this Lodge transmit a copy of the above to the family of the deceased; and record the same upon the record-book of this Lodge; and that he will have the same published in the New Orleans Christian Advocate,

Children!
TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of this 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

Communication. ABERDEEN, Aug. 10th, 1858.
DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against the terrible enemy of children, I was

NEW YORK CORRESPONDENCE.

Dr. Hutton's Church—Dr. Scudder, Missionary from India—Old Dutch Church Waking Up—Low and Gospel—Christians Worshipping Idols—The Revival—Wee Among the the Papers on the Subject—Preaching in the Academy of Music—The Eloquent Blind Preacher—Dr. Marshall at St. Paul's—Dr. Young—Dr. Parsons—North Divided Against Itself—Extirpation of Slaveholders—Dark Days of the Apostles.

Mr. Editor—Being somewhat disposed to dissipate religiously, by leaving our own church and the eloquent and wholesome teachings of our own pastor—a thing, by the way, we don't often indulge in—we concluded to go to Dr. Hutton's church, on Washington square, to listen to the younger Dr. Scudder, a missionary from India.

This son of Dr. Scudder, we believe, was born in India, and has been a missionary for a number of years; hence he comes among us well posted in regard to the past and present history of that ill-fated country. He has two brothers also engaged in the missionary work in India, who, with himself, are connected with the Dutch Reformed Church. A new life seems to have been infused into the old Dutch Church since it has severed its connection with the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. One of the churches here, the Middle Dutch, has resolved on supporting three missionaries in Japan; and recently a distinguished and wealthy lawyer of this church has consecrated himself to the work of foreign missions, and intends going out, on his own charges, to preach the gospel to his dying fellow men.

Dr. Hutton's church was crowded in every part, to listen to the enthusiastic young missionary. His description of the terrific scenes of the late rebellion in India were truly graphic and thrilling. He was particularly severe upon the East India Company, which had given the custodian of the idolatrous religion in India. High officers of state had been known to take off their hats and bow in veneration to their great idols on festive days, and to present them votive offerings. They at first opposed the missionaries, and prohibited them from establishing missions in the provinces; but a more liberal policy soon prevailed, and now nearly the whole of India is open to the missionary. His text was peculiarly appropriate: "Behold, I set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it. I know thy works, and thou hast a little strength." In the discussion of his subject he showed, that God in His providence had opened the door of all heathen lands, and that it was not in the power of earth or hell to close that door. The signs of the times, he remarked, were of the most hopeful character. Dr. Scudder spoke very approvingly of the missionary labors of the Episcopal, Presbyterian and Baptist Churches in India; but he did not seem to know, or perhaps he was not careful to know, that there were any representatives of the Methodist Church in that country. But we will let that pass.

The Revival in New York has reached its end, so far as any particular interest is concerned. The daily prayer meetings are, however, kept up, and considerable effort is made to sustain them. The New York Independent, an Ishmaelitish sheet, which is down on orthodoxy, the Bible, and Tract Societies, and up on abolition and dry-goods, came out in an edidorial, not long since, not exactly against the revival, but intimating strongly that the reports in the Observer, Evangelist, and Intelligencer, were got up for effect and were more on the style of dramatic representations than sober realities. The latter paper denies the allegations of the Independent, and charges its religious editors with a want of interest in the revival, and more than intimates that the reverend editors were more concerned in lecturing on politics, and in "Wit and Humor," than in attending the daily prayer meetings, and hence were not competent judges.

The new feature which was inaugurated last winter, principally through the agency of Dr. Prime of the Observer—who, by the way, is a most estimable, large-hearted Christian gentleman—of introducing the gospel into that magnificent palace of art, the Academy of Music, has proved a great success. The most distinguished ministers of the different Evangelical Churches have held forth to listening thousands. The largest crowd attracted to these meetings was present on last Subbath evening to hear the eloquent Milburn, the pastor of the Pacific-street Methodist Church, Brooklyn. His theme was well chosen and most admirably and eloquently discussed. As he presented, in a searching and impressive manner the unsatisfying nature of all earthly good, founded upon the declaration—"vanity of vunities, all is vanity," many a hitter experience was touched, and many a heart, best knowing its own bitterness, responded thereto. The calm dignity of the preacher as he enunciated the truth in faultless tones and in clear mellifluous voice, which reached the farthest galleries of that immense building, had a most inspiring effect, and we trust the gospel seed found a lodging in the hearts of many of pride and fashion's votaries.

The Rev. Dr. Marshall, of Mississippi, is now in our city on a visit. He preached on Sabbath evening last, at St. Paul's Church on Fourth Avenue. This is by far the most fashionable Methodist Church in the city. The edifice, which is of white marble, is not surpassed by any of the Churches in New York for beauty and finish. Though we speak of it as a fashionable Church, we do not mean that it is so in any offensive sense. It has a thoroughly evangelical pastor, in the person of Dr. McClintock, and in no Methodist Church in the city are the classes better attended. Besides all this, it takes the lead in all benevolent enterprizes, and gave not long since ten thousand dollars to the Missionary Society. Dr. Marshall's sermon was well received. We never heard a man speak with greater ease and fluency, and such is his popular address that we judge he must be a favorite in the South.

Not long since we had the pleasure of listening to a sermon from Dr. Young of your State. He is a local minister and President of Louisiana railroad. We never listened to a discourse more clear in exegesis, sound in doctrine, pointed, practical and impressive, than that of Dr. Young. Competent as he may be to manage the affairs of a railroad, we question very much if the spirit and talents of the man do not more strongly indicate that he should give himself wholly to the work of the ministry. All who heard him, and he had a large congregation, were equally impressed with your correspondent that he is a master workman.

Considerable efforts were made, by one of our Churches in Brooklyn to obtain Dr. Parsons of Louisville as pastor. This is not the first invitation the Dr. has received from Methodist Churches in New York to change his relation and, we have no doubt, that if transfers could be had from South to North, and vice versa, there would be a much greater interchange, perhaps, than there was before our unhappy division. That division not only destroyed our unity but our general itinerancy; and we fear the end is not yet, on the subject of disunion. Should the general rule on the subject of slavery be changed so as to exclude slaveholders from the Church, of which we entertain no donbt, the North will be divided against itself; and how long Northern Methodism itself will stand, time only can determine. From the spirit and temper of the Abolitionists no other result can be looked for, as they seem to be determined to carry out the doctrine, not of "the extirpation of slavery," but the extirpation of slaveholders from the Methodist Church, regardless of all principle. One of the leading Abolitionists of the New York East Conference, in answer to a question—what he thought of the slavery in the Apostolic Church, exclaimed "Poh! do you think we are going back to the dark days of Christianity in the Apostles, time, for examples in these days of superior light." It would seem from this, that the nearer we get to Christ and his Apostles, or in other words the nearer we approach the fountain of inspiration, the more dark and muddy the stream. Comment is unnecessary. More anon. JUVENIS.

ARMINIANISM AND CALVINISM.

The Atonement.

Confession of Faith, says, p. 27, Chap. 3, § 6:

"Wherefore, they who are elected, being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ; are effectually called unto faith in Christ, by his Spirit working in due season; are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by his power, through faith, unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified and saved, but the elect only."

Upon this section, the authorized expositor of the Confession says:

"In this section, we are taught that Christ died exclusively for the elect, and purchased redemption for them alone. In other words, that Christ made atonement for the elect; and that in no sense did he die for the rest of the race. Our Confession first asserts positively that the elect are redeemed by Christ, and then, negatively, that none others are redeemed by Christ, but the elect only. If this does not affirm the doctrine of particular or limited atonement, we know not what language could express that doctrine more explicitly."

Confession of Faith, Chap. 8, §8, says:

"To all those for whom Christ hath purchased redemption, he doth certainly and effectually apply and communicate the same."

Upon this section, the authorized expositor of the Confession remarks:

"This section relates to the extent of Christ's death, with respect to its objects, and in opposition to the Arminian tenet—that Christ died for all men—for those who shall finally perish, as well as for those who shall be eventually saved; it affirms, that the purchase and application of redemption are of the same extent. In the fifth section, we were taught, that Christ purchased redemption, only for those whom the Father hath given him; and here it is asserted, that to all those for whom Christ hath purchased redemption he doth certainly and effectually apply and communicate the same. What language, then, could affirm more explicitly than that here employed, that the atonement of Christ is specific and limited, that it is neither universal nor indefinite, but is restricted to the elect, who shall be saved from wrath through him.

"The sacrifice of Christ derived infinite value from the divinity of his person; it must, therefore, have been intrinsically sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole human race, had it been so intended; but in the design of the Father, and in the intention of Christ himself, it was limited to a definite number, who shall ultimately obtain salvation."

That, we should say, is plain doctrine plainly expounded; no attempt to "handle the high mystery with special prudence and care!" We admire the candor and frankness of this out-spoken expositor. He deserves to be an authorized expounder.

We will indulge ourselves in another slice from the same loaf. Says the expositor, Rev. R. Shaw:

"It (the Confession of Faith, Chap. 3, § 6) is diametrically opposed to the system of the Arminians; who hold, that Jesus Christ, by his death and sufferings, made an atonement for the sins of all mankind in general, and for every individual in particular. It is not less opposed to the doctrine maintained by many, that though the death of Christ had a special reference to the elect, and, in connection with the divine purpose, infallibly secures their salvation; yet that it has a general reference, and made an equal atonement for all men. The celebrated Richard Baxter, who favored general redemption, makes the following remarks on this and another section of our Confession (Chap. 3, § 6, and Chap. 8, § 8) which speaks against universal redemption: 'I understand not of all redemption—and particularly not of the mere bearing of the punishment of man's sins, and satisfying God's justice—but of that special redemption proper to the elect, which was accompanied with an intention of actual application of saving benefits in time. If I may not be allowed this interpretation, I must hence dissent.' The language of the Confession, in my opinion, will not admit of this interpretation; and, what is more, the Bible is silent about this general redemption, or the general reference of the death of Christ."

We could quote more of the same sort from "Ridgeley's Divinity," "Hill's Divinity," "Buck's Theological Dictionary," and "Synod of Dort"—but we will not consume valuable space. We merely wish to give our readers some plain quotations from standard Calvinistic writers—especially such as may not have access to those writers—that they may see what the Calvinists teach, as distinguished from the Arminians.

We do not wish to distort, or set down aught in malice. We do not quote their "texts," because we all believe them as much as Calvinists—they put one construction on them, and we another.

Some quotations made a few weeks since were from the second, instead of the first volume of Calvin's Institutes. Let any one read the 21, 22, and 23 Chapters of Vol. II., of Calvin's Institutes, and they will find what we quote, and much more of the same import. VERITAS.

PARSONAGES.

Mr. Editor: I have been looking a little into the subject of Parsonages lately—their history, number, and kind—in this (Mississippi) Conference; and, would you believe it? in this Conference, of one hundred members, and about seventy stations and circuits, there are hardly one dozen of these important appendages to Methodism. It is true, there are quite a number of our brethren called "local itinerants," who have homes of their own. The amount of property which they own, (which it is their duty to take care of, as also to preach) circumstances of a domestic nature, or their age in the ministry, have made the course they pursue in this respect the most successful one, all interests considered, for them. And, allow me to say, that, as a traveling preacher, I do seriously demur to the—shall I say?—"slang" which is often heard, and sometimes written, against worthy brethren—some of them aged and powerful ministers of Christ—who are thus situated. And, further, to suggest as true, the idea, that what is called—sometimes sneeringly—"local itinerancy," if upon a proper basis and in proper quantity, is not so great an evil after all; nor is there, to my mind, any great objection to it. Nay, a minister with a large family ought to have a home of his own, whatever office he may fill. But, if we add—as has been done—a necessary regard to the circumstances of brethren thus situated by the appointing power, a neglect on the part of stations and circuits to have good and suitable parsonages for the use of those who have not "homes of their own," then we see a fountain open for brackish, if not for bitter water.

Now, this fountain may be dried up easily, quickly; not by fighting at "local itinerancy," but by going to work and building and furnishing a parsonage in every charge. It may be inquired, "Why is it that this desideratum has not been obtained? Whose fault is it?" Your correspondent thinks that the fault is with the preachers themselves, and that almost exclusively. Does any one ask, "How?—Wherein?"—He answers, First, in that they have not raised the money, by proper appeals to the people, for the purchase or building of parsonages. Should any brother say this could not have been done, I would answer, he does not know—we have not tried. Some preachers are afraid to say much about money, even for missionary purposes, or for our superannuated preachers, widows, etc. Many a congregation attempts to hear preaching in a shivering, whistling log-cabin or hut in the winter, and migrates to a bush-harbor (preacher-killer) in the summer, for the same effort; all because the preachers, from year to year, have been afraid, if they should go to work and raise money to build a church, they would fail to get their "pay."

Often the writer has heard very prudent members of his "charge" say: "Brother, you'd better mind—you haven't got your 'quarterage' yet!" This when money was called for to build a church, or for missions, etc. Now, some preachers give heed to such sinful suggestions. There are those who never have done so. But, from this, and other suggestions and causes, many of us have chosen to beg around for board, or go in debt, or pay cash for a "home of our own."

I venture this: that there is not a circuit, station, or mission to the blacks, in the bounds of this Conference, unable to purchase a home for their pastor; and very few, if one, that would evince a lengthy unwillingness to do so, if simply asked, or, at most, urged thereto.

Another evil has been a refusal or failure on the part of ministers to occupy parsonages that have been procured. This may be remedied. It has been, I suppose, from one of two causes: Either, first, the pastor had a place of his own, and it did not suit him to "move;" or, second, that the house offered was not furnished, and he was not able, or not willing, to furnish it himself; and, whether from the first or second cause, the fact, that the place was not used by him, caused it to go to wreck, either by lying waste, or by abuse from improper tenants.

Now, either of the above evils might have been, and may generally be, obviated. In the first, the preacher should have taken charge of the place, as was his duty, de jure, to have done—carefully invoiced the furnishing, if any—and held himself responsible, in dollars and cents, for the safe keeping of the place and its appurtenances, during his charge of the congregation owning it, in trust, for the use of their pastor. Whether he chose to rent the place or not, would be at his own election; for the use of it, or its proceeds, belonged to him during his said charge as pastor, etc.

I will digress here to say, that in my humble opinion, that dead-letter "deliverance" of the last General Conference, authorizing a Board of Stewards to withhold an allowance for living expenses from a preacher who refuses to occupy a parsonage, no congregation of Christians would recognize; and, I am sure, no pastor, with proper respect for himself and family, would serve a congregation who would allow the appliance of the rule to him or his "case." But there is no danger of such an attempt on the part of any Board of Stewards, unless they desired to relieve themselves of the burthen of a preacher with whom they were not well pleased. In such case, the "deliverance" may work well.

To return—let the preacher take charge of and use the parsonage, as is his right and duty. I will just add, as it comes in my way, that it is mean, if not worse, to take the rent of the parsonage from the amount allowed the pastor, simply because he happened to have a "home" elsewhere, or was in circumstances which precluded such occupancy.

The second cause of non-occupancy might have been, and may always be remedied in short order, by raising a little money, only. The ladies in any community will be found willing to furnish a house, at least with heavy furniture, for their pastor and his family. Then, if the house is not furnished, the preacher should go to work and have it done.

The third and last "count" I make, is, the absence of proper care and industry on the part of occupants, to keep up, improve, and beautify such premises and houses as have been secured. Some preachers seem to feel that they are only renters, and confine themselves, so far as their temporary home is concerned, to the meanest usages of ordinary renters; and hence, the planting of fruit trees, shrubs, or anything of the kind, to enrich or beautify the place, would be strange work for them. Fruit and flowers seem to possess no charms for such men.

I can't judge of the wife. She would like to see the husband do better, I "guess." Worse still: In some instances, where the preacher had philanthropy and religion enough to induce him, with the aid of his helpmate, to beautify the yard with shrubs and flowers, and set out some choice fruit trees—on the principle that if they did not bear fruit for him, they would for some other brother and family—sad to say, he had as his successor, one who occupied on the renting system; and who was either too studious, too indolent, or—must I say it—too stingy to purchase and drive a few nails, or place a few hinges; so that pickets and gates found a resting place on the ground, until "aunt" somebody wanted to "start a fire." Then the stock, found their way in—not quite into the house, except in a few rare cases—and away goes all the fruit and all the beauty!

"For the want of a nail the shoe was lost,'
For the want of a shoe the foot was lost," etc.

Now what is the conclusion? It is patent to us all:

First. The preachers should raise funds this year, and secure a parsonage to every circuit, station, and mission, where such a thing is needed.

Second. Then they should occupy them, whenever at all practicable.

Third. And, especially, let all the occupants of these Homes for Itinerant Pastors take care of, keep up, and beautify them in a genteel manner. FRATER.

REV. JAMES ALFORD SHOCKLEY.

Having access to brother Samuel Williams' library, of Philadelphia, Mississippi, I find there a small book, containing some interesting facts of this good man of God, written by his own hands. It is known to a great many of your readers, that Rev. James A. Shockley departed this life in the latter part of the year 1844. If I mistake not, he visited a camp-meeting, on the Paulding Circuit, Mississippi Conference, in October, 1844; there he was taken sick, and remained in the tent of Rev. R. J. Jones, now Presiding Elder on the Biloxi district, until the camp-meeting broke. Then he was carried to the house of Dr. Wm. B. Dozier, in the town of Paulding, where he died, and was interred with masonic honors in the Paulding grave-yard; where he will rest until he comes forth to his reward, which will be a happy one, no doubt.

Believing that it will be interesting to all who knew brother Shockley, I give you his own words in reference to his pilgrimage in this world.

"James Alford Shockley, Eldest son of Richard and Elizabeth Shockley, was born September 30th, A.D. 1809, in Franklin county, Georgia.

"My parents were of English and Dutch descent, inclined to the Baptist denomination, though they were not members of any Church. My father was a very moral man. Although he would take his morning drams he never became intoxicated but once or twice. He was averse to using profane language. And would not permit any one to do so in the presence of his family. He served his country both in a civil and military capacity. When I was about six years old, my grand-father, Shockley, died; my father then moved back to his native State, South Carolina.

"My grand-father lived on the east bank of the Savannah river, in what was then called Pendleton district, afterwards called Anderson. In my ninth year, I, with my eldest sister, was sent to school. Then, again, in my 11th year, I heard the first Methodist preacher preach at the Church near the school-house. The teacher was a Methodist, consequently he had us all to attend the Church on preaching days. Rev. John B. Chapel, was our preacher. He took for his text, "Behold I stand at the door and knock, etc." God attended his efforts with the Spirit, and a great revival ensued. I know they shouted powerfully. Then was the first time that I became convinced of sin, and knew it to be necessary for my salvation to prepare myself for death and a future state of existence.

"Notwithstanding the words spoken from the sacred desk sent conviction to my wicked heart and caused me to feel myself a sinner, I left the house, being very much alarmed by the the shouting. As I was not used to such proceedings, I concluded the feelings that I had originated from being frightened. But I continued to attend preaching, and my conviction was soon renewed. About this time, through the instrumentality of an old professor in the neighborhood and the preacher in charge, my father joined the Methodist Episcopal Church on probation. His house then became a home for the preachers, but I would remain in their company as little as possible. Although I would avoid the company of the preachers as much as I could, I continued to pray for that preparation of heart that would fit me for a seat at God's right hand, and expected to obtain it sometime.

"The year closed, I was taken home to assist my father in his farm, I still attended the preaching of the word. In August, 1822, my father tented at a camp-meeting, at which I became a regular mourner, as I went for no other purpose but to get religion, if I could. Continuing to mourn until the second or third day of the meeting, God in answer to my prayer converted my soul. I felt that my sins were all forgiven. I then went and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was baptized.

"I then concluded that I would always live in the enjoyment of that blessing. But there was not much attention paid to my conversion, for I was in my 13th year and quite small, and the people seemed to think, because I was young, I did not know what I was doing. Consequently they thought it would all soon wear off. Just so many think to this day, in reference to the conversion of children.

"I returned home from the camp-meeting, and when I began to mingle with the affairs of life, my path was soon crossed by the enemy of souls. I became angry and lost my enjoyment. But I had selected a place to resort to for prayer, before I obtained the pearl of great price. I soon made my way back to the same old spot; there I prayed and wrestled with the Lord, until I received the blessing again. I then lived in the enjoyment of religion for some time.

"I turned my attention to reading and seeking after knowledge. The next year the cause seemed to flag, many went back to the world.

"My father, having been converted at or near the same time I was, continued to be faithful to the performance of his religious duties. He in company with old brother E. would regularly attend class-meetings; they would insist on my going with them; and I could not well avoid their solicitations. I had become very lukewarm in my feelings, but still kept up the outward form of religion, remembering that I had set out for heaven, and if I turned back I never would reach there. So I would renew my courage, and endeavor to press on—though many who started when I did, went back to the world—which very much discouraged me.

"When I was about the age of sixteen I was appointed class-leader. The cross of leading a class was as much as I could carry. But I soon obtained more strength, and did the best I could.

"At the age of twenty one, I applied for licence to exhort. There was an objection to my obtaining licence. The objection was founded on these grounds, that they could not spare me as leader, for if I was licenced to exhort, I would have appointments off, and could not attend to my class, as leader. Soon after this, I was deeply impressed that it was my duty to preach the word. But the enemy soon began to work with me in reference to this matter. I gave way to a great extent to his teachings, and concluded I would marry and remain a private member in the Church.

"I moved off fifteen or twenty miles, and commenced teaching school. But I was prevailed upon to take the leadership of a class.

"In May of the same year I married, moved back to my old society, expecting to accumulate wealth and let others do their preaching. I concluded that if I could make something to pay the preachers with, all would be well. But my brethren insisted I should take licence to exhort. I did so, but to no profit, I thought.

"In the fall of 1833, I left my native State, and moved to Pickens county, Alabama. I gave my letter to the Church at that place; I applied for licence to preach in the fall of 1834, which was accordingly granted.

"But in the Spring of 1835 my licence was taken from me. I was so much taken up with the things of this world that they did me no good; I got into a difficulty, and was turned out of the Church. But I did not stay out long. This is a black spot in my life. I deeply repented of my folly and sought forgiveness from my Creator. Through the influence of brother J. K. Hawkins, I was again licenced as a local preacher. I was then employed one year by brother E. N. Tally, to take the Decatur Mission in the Mississippi Conference. This was a great year with me, the Lord blessed the people with whom I labored, and he also blessed my own soul abundantly.

"In 1842 I joined the Mississippi Annual Conference, and was appointed to the Paulding circuit; in 1843, to the Decatur circuit; in 1844, to the White Sand circuit; I reached brother Joseph Carr's, February 1st, on White Sand circuit."

These words were written, as I before said, by brother Shockley. Though he has been dead some fourteen or fifteen years, yet, when these lines are seen by his old friends and relations they will bring to mind a great many pleasant moments they spent with him on the works he traveled. I know men who were at his death-bed, that can testify of his happy exit into a better world. I heard him preach the last sermon he ever preached. He preached it at the Paulding camp-meeting. There is no stone to mark his resting-place in the Paulding grave-yard. But he is still held in remembrance by all those who knew him. I send you these lines hoping you will publish them, as they will be intergating to his friends. K. A. J.

BENSON VERSUS POOL.

Mr. Editor: In your paper of Oct. 16th, 1858, you published an article from me, stating that Benson had plagiarized his Commentary up to a certain chapter in Isaiah from Pool. Two or three replies have been made to this, not at all helping the matter, as I think. I know that Benson mentioned Pools name, and occasionally put a line or two in quotation marks from him, as he does sometimes from others; but I had not then, nor have I yet seen or heard of any credit he has given Pool for the work he has transferred to his pages and called his own.

As I did not profess to have read the whole of Benson, I turned at once to the chapters specified, where it was said the credit was given, but I did not find any. I did find what I had often seen before, a line or two, never more than five or six, accredited to Pool, and now and then the rendering of a Hebrew word; and, sometimes, renderings and expositions referred to Pool, not found in his work; but I have not found where Benson has said, which is true, that by far the larger part of his work, to the 58th of Isaiah, is taken word by word and letter by letter from Pool. Benson does, two or three times in a Book, perhaps quote, with credit, one or two lines from Pool, or after transcribing him, says, see Pool; but he does not give the faintest intimation that the long solid columns both before and after his quotation marks, stretching over pages and chapters, are taken bodily from Pool's Annotations.

If your columns are not full of other and more interesting matter, I will transcribe one or two of the places, with their surroundings, where your correspondent says the proper credit is given.

Ps. 38: 7. For my loins are filled with a loathsome disease; and there is no soundness in my flesh.

BENSON.—"The disease," says Pool, "might be some burning fever, breaking forth outwardly in carbuncles or boils. It is true, this and the other expressions may be taken figuratively, but we should not forsake the literal sense of the words without necessity."

POOL.—The disease might be some burning fever, being also malignant or pestilential, either burning inwardly, or breaking forth outwardly in carbuncles or boils. It is true, this and the other expressions may be taken figuratively, of some grievous calamity, but we should not forsake the proper and literal sense of the words without necessity.

Ps. 38: 6. I am troubled; I am bowed down greatly; I go mourning all the day long.

BENSON.—I am troubled, I am distorted or depressed; or, as it is expressed by another word signifying the same thing, bowed down: namely, in my body, as diseased persons generally are, and, withal, dejected in my mind. I go mourning—Hebrew, in black, the sign of mourning, which here may be taken figuratively. When I arise out of my bed and walk, or rather creep about in my chamber, I do it with a sad heart and dejected countenance. Or, going may be here meant of his languishing, or going towards the grave, as the same word is used sometimes.

POOL.—Troubled; Hebrew, distorted or depressed; or, as it is expressed by another word signifying the same thing, bowed down: to wit, in my body, as diseased persons commonly are, and withal dejected in my mind. I go mourning—Hebrew, in black, the sign of mourning, which may here signify the thing, as signs oft do. When I arise out of my bed and walk, or rather creep about in my chamber, I do it with a sad heart and dejected countenance. Or, going here may be meant of his languishing, or going towards the grave, as this same word is used, Gen. xv., 2, etc.

Verse 7. I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my heart.

BENSON.—Roared like a lion or bear, namely, through extreme misery; by reason of the disquietness of my heart—for the great anxiety and torment of my mind, caused by the deep sense of my sins, and of God's wrath, and of the sad issue of both. My groaning is not hid (verse 9). I do not utter all these complaints, nor roar out, that thou mayest hear and know them; fur thou hearest and knowest my lowest words, yea, the desires of my heart and all my necessities; and therefore I pray thee, pity me and deliver me, as I trust thou wilt.

POOL.—Roared like a bear or lion, through extreme pain and misery. By reason of the disquietness of my heart. For the great anxiety and torment of my mind, caused by the deep sense of my sins, and God's wrath, and the sad issue of my disease. (verse 9.) I do not utter all these complaints, nor roar out, that thou mayest hear them and know them; for thou hearest and knowest even my lowest groans, yea, my inward desires and all my necessities; and therefore, I pray thee, pity and deliver me, as I trust thou wilt.

My heart panteth, goeth round (verse 10); palpitates, through fear and grief; or, it is perplexed and tossed with many and various thoughts, not knowing what to do, or whither to go. The light of mine eyes. Mine eyes are grown dim; either through grief and tears, or through weakness.

Verse 10. My heart panteth. Panteth, or goeth round: wanders hither and thither, as the word signifies; is perplexed and tossed with many and various thoughts, not knowing what to do nor whither to go. Mine eyes are grown dim; either through grief and tears, or through weakness.

My lovers and friends (verse 11) stand aloof. Either through neglect and contempt, or disdain of me. They that seek my life lay snares for me. That if my affliction and trouble do not kill me, they may destroy me in in some other way. And imagine deceits all the day long. They design mischief, but cover it with fair pretences.

My lovers and friends stand aloof (v. 11). Either through neglect and contempt, or disdain of me. They that seek my life lay snares for me. That if my disease do not kill me they may destroy me some other way. Imagine deceits against me. They design mischief, but cover it with fair pretences.

But I as a deaf man heard it not (verse 13). I carried myself toward them as if I had no ears, to hear what they said, either to me or of me, nor a tongue to answer or reprove them for their reproaches and calumnies; and he was thus silent, not for want of just answers to them, but to testify his humiliation for his sins, and his acceptation of the punishment which he had brought on himself.

But I as a deaf man heard it not (v. 13). I carried myself toward them as if I had no ears to hear, either what they said to me or of me, nor a tongue to answer or reprove them for their reproaches and calumnies, which he did, not for want of just answers to them, but to testify his humiliation for his sins, and his patient submission to and acceptation of the punishment which he had brought on himself.

With the same verbal fidelity he has copied every verse in this Psalm, together with the title; and yet this is one of the places to which I was referred for proof that Benson had not plagiarized! The other references are like unto it.

The next item of proof, I am told, is to be had in the 50th Psalm. On the fourth verse, just twelve words are accredited to Pool; not one of which is in Pool's book. And here, as usual, Benson has transcribed the whole Psalm—every verse of it, title and all. See a specimen:

Verse 5. Gather my Saints together unto me.

BENSON.—Oh! ye angels, summon and fetch them to my tribunal; which is poetically spoken, to continue the metaphor and representation of the judgment here mentioned.

My saints. The Israelites, whom he calls saints; first, because they were all by profession a holy people, as they are called in Deut. xiv, 2; and second, as an argument and evidence against them; because God had chosen and separated them from all the nations of the earth, to be a holy and peculiar people to Himself, and they had also solemnly and frequently devoted themselves to God and his service; all which did greatly aggravate the guilt of their present apostacy. Those that have made a covenant with me, etc. Who have entered into covenant with me and have ratified with me by sacrifice. Not only in their parents, (Ex. xxiv. 4, etc.) but also in their own persons, from time to time, even as often as they have offered sacrifices to me. This seems to be added, to acquaint them with the proper nature, use and end of sacrifices, which were principally appointed to be signs and seals of the covenant made between God and his people; and, consequently, to convince them of their great mistake in trusting to their outward sacrifices, when they had neglected the very life and soul of them, which was the keeping of their covenant with God; and, withal, to diminish that too high opinion which they had of sacrifices, and to prepare the way for the abolition of them.

POOL.—Oh! ye angels, summon and fetch them to my tribunal; which is poetically spoken, not as if they were actually to do so, but only to continue the metaphor and representation of the judgment. My saints. The delinquents, the Israelites, whom he calls saints; partly because they were all by profession a holy people, as they are called in Deut.: xiv, 3; partly, by an irony, intimating how unworthy they were of that name; and partly, as an argument or evidence against them, because God had chosen and separated them from all the nations of the earth, to be a holy and peculiar people to himself, and therefore also solemnly and frequently consecrated and devoted themselves to God, and to his faithful service; all which did greatly aggravate their present apostacy. Those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice, i. e, which have entered with me, and have ratified the covenant with me by sacrifice, not only in their parents Ex 24 7 etc., but also in their own persons from time to time, even as often as they offer sacrifices to me. This clause seems to be added here, to acquaint with the proper nature, use and end of sacrifices, which were principally appointed to be signs and seals of the covenant made between God and his people; and consequently to convince them of their great mistake and wickedness in trusting to their outward sacrifices, when they neglect the very life and soul of them, which was the keeping of their covenant with God; and withal to diminish that overweening conceit which they had of sacrifices and to prepare the way for the abolition of them.

Proverbs, 8, is given; and here just four lines are credited, while the whole chapter is appropriated.

Doth not wisdom cry?—1, 2.

BENSON.—It is a great question what this wisdom is, of which Solomon discourses so largely in this chapter. Some understand it of that attribute or perfection of the Divine nature, which is called wisdom: whereby God perfectly knows all things, and makes known to men what he judges it necessary or expedient for them to know. [Here, follows eight lines from Bishop Patrick.] Others, however understand it of the Son of God, who is called the Wisdom of God—xi, 49. And it cannot fairly be denied, that some passages do best agree to the former, and others to the latter opinion. Possibly, says Poole, "both may be joined together, and the chapter may be understood, of Christ; considered partly in his personal capacity and partly in regard to his office, which was to impart the will and mind of God to mankind. This he did, 1st, By revealing it to and writing it upon the mind of man at his first creation; 2d, By publishing it unto the patriarchs in the time of the Old Testament; 3d, By declaring it from his own mouth, and by his apostles and ministers under the gospel. She standeth in the top of high places—where she may be seen and heard, not in corners and in the dark, as the harlot did; by the way, in the places of the paths—where many paths meet—where there is a great concourse; and where travelers may need direction. She crieth at the gates—the places of judgment and the confluence of the people; at the entry of the city—to invite passengers at their first coming, and conduct them to her house.

POOL.—It is a great question, what this wisdom is, of which Solomon discourseth so largely and profoundly in this chapter. Some understand it of that attribute or perfection of the Divine nature which is called wisdom, whereby God perfectly knows all things, and maketh known to men what he judgeth necessary or expedient for them to know. Others understand it of the second person in the God-head, the Son of God, who is called the wisdom of God—See xi. 49. And it cannot fairly be denied that some passages do best agree to the former, and others to the latter opinion. Possibly, both may be joined together, and the chapter may be understood, of Christ—considered, partly in his personal capacity, and partly in regard to his office, which was to impart the mind and will of God to mankind, which he did: 1. By revealing it to and writing it upon the mind of man at his first creation; 2. By publishing it unto the holy patriarchs and prophets, in the time of the Old Testament; 3. By declaring it from his own mouth, and by the apostles and ministers under the gospel. In the top of high places, where she may be best seen and heard, not in corners and in the dark, as the harlot did. In the places of the paths, where many paths meet, where there is a great concourse, and where travelers may need direction. At the gates—the places of judgment and of the confluence of the people. At the entry of the city, to invite passengers at their first coming, and to conduct them to her house.

The other references I have examined, as well as other places not given; and they are in no respect different from the ones I have attended to. The 11th of Judges, for instance, is cited—this whole chapter, like all the others is plagiarized; but at the close Benson remarks, that Pool thinks the story of Iphigenia took its rise from that of Jephthah's daughter. Such is a specimen of the credit Benson gives. If a line or two, with the quotation marks once in a hundred pages or so; or if to say, in five large volumes, "see Pool," is an acknowledgment that the principal part is merely transcribed, then Benson has made the proper acknowledgement. If it were true that only a few chapters were taken by Benson—a paragraph now and then—I would say nothing; but the fact is, it is done by the wholesale, and almost every where. I could fill your paper, from now till Christmas, with the plagiarisms, or until you had published the greater part of both works in parallel columns. It is perfectly idle to say that Benson was such a great preacher, or great theologian, or great Hebraist, or great anything else that he could not have committed this great literary theft—he did do it. And it is just as idle to say, that he merely "compressed," or "compiled," or quoted Pool through other authors—he copied him. And there is not a syllable of acknowledgement for this wholesale transfer of Pool to his pages that I have seen or heard of.

SAVING A SOUL.

It is interesting to observe the indignation everywhere excited by the story of little Mortara Levi, the Jewish boy of Bologna. What can be more utterly absurd and outrageously unjust than the act of the "Holy Inquisition," tearing a child six years of age from his home and the arms of his parents, and claiming him for the Church, because the solemn farce of baptizing him into the Roman Catholic faith had been secretly and dishonestly performed over his unconscious little body, when he was an infant. This reminds us of a robber who once went to obtain pardon of a priest for past and future crimes, confessing himself guilty of every one of the seven capital sins, not to speak of numberless minor offences, but claiming that he had done, at least, one meritorious act in his life; he had converted a Jew. "Very good," said the priest; "how did you effect this miracle?"

"I robbed him," answered the penitent, "and then pitched him into the river. He entreated me to take him into the boat again, and I promised to do so on condition that he should renounce his religion. As he could not swim, and had already sunk once, he was forced to comply. 'Now, for mercy's sake,' he cried, ready to sink again, 'take me on board!' Declare yourself a Catholic, said I, holding an oar over his head. He could just gasp—'I declare myself a Catholic!' and sunk again.

"So you saved him," said the Priest.

"Did I!" replied the penitent. "Don't you see, if he had ever got sabore alive, he would have turned Jew again! That's our way to save a man's soul!" "Die in the faith," said I, as he came up for the last time. And as he reached out his hand for the boat, I just gave him a gentle tap on the head with the oar, and dispatched his soul to heaven."

We think there is equal merit in the way the Pope takes to save the soul of little Mortara Levi.—[Olive Branch.]

METHODISTS & METHODIST PROTESTANTS.

The Methodist Protestants separated from the Methodist Episcopal Church many years ago, because they were opposed to Episcopacy, and in favor of lay-representation, and because they failed in their efforts to engraft their principles upon the economy of the Church. With all their "democracy," they, being in a hopeless minority, were not willing to be governed by the majority. The "old-liners" were the best republicans of the two, as well as the best conservatives; for they represented the sentiments of the great body of the Church, and resisted the uncalled-for demand of a few theorists for great, sudden, and therefore dangerous changes. But both sides had a right to their opinions, and the memory of their leaders should not be tarnished by the imputation of wrong motives. Many of them, however, on both sides, were wrong in spirit, and unwise in counsel. The secession was a totally unnecessary and foolish one, and might have been avoided, but for these things. We think it will be admitted, however, that the impracticability which forced it, was on the part of the Protestants.

Of late years our Methodist Protestant brethren have tacitly given up the controversy on the Episcopal question, and impliedly proposed a re-union, on the condition that the "old-liners" yield the lay-representation question. The proposition now freely discussed in the Northern Methodist Episcopal Church, to introduce lay-representation proper, and the recent introduction of a plan for lay-co-operation in the Southern Church, have greatly stimulated the hope, and the discussion of the question, of re-union.

While we love all Methodists as members of the same great spiritual family, and would rejoice with a great joy to live to see the day when all branches of them should be re-united in one ecclesiastical body, that we might "depart" in the "peace" of this "salvation;" we cannot refrain from expressing the opinion that these discussions, quasi negotiations, and the hopes founded upon them, are vain—perhaps injurious. Things ripen of themselves, according to the course of nature, and if plucked green will decay, offend, and nauseate. Much Church legislation is an evil in itself. None is needed, except absolutely and generally demanded. When had, with a view to the success of ecclesiastical diplomatic [illegible], it is unscriptural and sinful—wrong in itself, [illegible] in influence, and fruitless for the ends proposed.

As to the Southern Methodist Episcopal Church, these discussions and hopes have no basis. There is no prospect whatever that such legislation will be had as is made the condition of the re-union. The opinion prevalent in some quarters, that there is a change in the public sentiment of the Church South on these questions, is utterly erroneous. The discussions which have led to this opinion have been confined to a few persons and pens. Outside friends—Baptists, Methodist Protestants, and Northern Episcopal Methodists—have given them large circulation and utterly undue significance. There are some differences of opinion among us on the abstract question—more in the ministry than in the laity—but no partyism at all—least of all, as between the ministry and laity.

But while there is harmony of spirit, and perfect willingness to do what is best, there is a general conviction that neither principle nor expediency demands any radical changes in the premises. This conviction, too, we firmly believe, after careful observation, has increased since the last General Conference, when the question was more freely discussed than ever before among us, and when, also, the lay-co-operation plan was inaugurated. That plan provides all that is called for on the part of the General Conference. It gives the Annual Conferences power to introduce lay-influence, in their own mode, to the fullest extent. That influence we need and hail. With that plan the church is satisfied.

One thing is certain: the Southern Methodists will never be brought to make any great changes of the kind proposed, by the clamor and agitation kept up by the press of our outside friends, who differ from us on the ecclesiastical principles in question; and if they are both wise and charitable, they will at length heed the lesson which many long years have essayed to teach them—let us alone—mind their own business—and let us mind ours. Ad captandum talk about "democracy," "republicanism," "despotism," "clerical tyranny," "natural rights," "conformity to the constitution of the United States," are wide of the mark—unfounded in scripture—unworthy of the subject—and are so understood throughout our connection. They are, for the most part, mere declamatory denunciations of deceitful demagogues for the delusion of diseased and disorganized minds, and the Southern Church has neither material for their malice nor ear for their arguments. Whatever the good providence of God may direct us to do, in conformity with the mission we were thrust out to fulfil—and to the fulfilment of which, we have been gradually led to the adoption of our present economy—that we will do, at the right time and in the right way.

We propose that our Methodist Protestant brethren—for whom we feel the warmest fraternal affection—for whom honest opinions we have the respect we claim for our own, and against whom we have never written or spoken a word—be left to follow the same course of independent, natural, and healthful development, without the artificial stimulus of negotiation with us, or hope of concession from us. If in this way we come together, the Lord will bless the union—not otherwise. If we can be married without the previous necessity of any unlawful divorces, neither sin, nor doubtful affection, nor bitter memories will mar our harmony, or blight our prospects. But the parties are not "eligible" now—not even for a "proposal."

THE BAD LEAVEN AT WORK.

Not very long since, we saw a letter from an agent of the American Sunday-school Union, in which he argued against the religious literature of the Christian Churches, and in favor of the Union publications, upon such considerations as follows:

He says: "About half the aid we receive is from men of the world, outsiders not connected with any church, who often express their views of these tems [meaning the christian religion as taught by the different branches of the Church of Christ. Ed.] with a freedom and force at once instructive and humiliating."

He says that such men ask: "What shall we do?—Our children are growing up, and we would gladly have them in the Sabbath-school; but the dominant denomination will not allow their children and ours to learn the word of God together, unless we take their ism and books, and all."

What is the unvarnished English of this plausible and jesuitical charge brought against the Christian Church? Why simply this—that it provides its own books, for its own schools, without asking the leave of an irresponsible and antagonistic human association.

The position impliedly taken by this writer is, that the time has come, when we must absolutely forsake the Christian Church in order to find a suitable religious literature; and that "men of the world" are better judges of what is adapted to the godly training of Christian children than the "wise and reverend heads" connected with our religious literature. The whims and opinions of "outsiders" are exalted as the "moral law" of Sunday-school evangelism; and the gospel, as preached and taught in our pulpits and religious books, is stigmatized as an "ism," along with socialism, abolitionism, Mormonism, spiritualism, and the like.

Such is the tendency of the American Sunday-school Union, as represented by one of its leading Agents in this South-western country. We may say that we have written of him before, for we wish our readers to know who he is. We do not charge this, however, upon the managers of the society. But they are badly represented.

Now we wish to show that this very tendency is identical with that of the popular infidelity of the day. Richard K. Cralle, who sometime since boastingly wrote his views of the religious sentiments of Mr. Calhoun, (which we believe to have been a misrepresentation) used the following language: "He was never connected with, or (to use the vulgar phraseology,) "belonged" to any of the denominations of the so-called Christian Church. His understanding was too exalted, too clear and truthfully trained to yield a blind obedience to the miserable dogmas of the prevalent popular creeds. He looked to his Maker, and not to weak, and perhaps wicked men for his faith. Nor did he trust the mighty interests of the future to the preposterous, yet pleasant inventions of councils, conventions, and other religious caucuses. He thought for himself—determined for himself—acted for himself; and doubtless never dreamed—in life or in death—of shunning responsibility, by seeking shelter behind any mental intercessor. He certainly never confided in the salvatory virtues of priests' prayers purchased at two cents a piece—nor on the imputed righteousness of his Lord and Master—in itself infinite, nor on original election and predestination to heaven—nor on "justification by faith only"—the most awful delusion that ever took possession of the human mind—nor on "irresistible grace," and the final preservance of the saints, viz: ourselves—that sweet, yet deadly morsel in the mouth of sinners—nor yet in the moral invulnerability resulting from being soused, heels over head, in a horse-pond, somewhat after the manner adopted by the mother of Paris, the pest of Troy. To all these inventions—inventions that have sowed iniquity broadcast throughout the Christian orb—he bowed in silence; but his head and his heart were far from them."

We received an obituary not long since, which shows the working of the same "leaven." It contained the following passage: "He had made no open profession of religion. Like some of our wisest and best men, he could not clearly see the necessity of attaching himself to any of the various sects in religion, but trusted his hopes with a firm and unwavering faith upon such Scriptures as this: 'Believe and be saved.'" It is but just to say, however, that the writer of the obituary, a christian man, does not subscribe to such views. It matters not where this disguised infidelity comes from, whether from unbelievers or professed believers, it has the same paternity. The American Sunday-school Union eschews the religious literature of the Christian Church, and also their religious periodicals, and seeks to supercede them by books and newspapers of its own. Why not have its own Churches, and pulpits, and Colleges? When will the Church of the living God awake to the insidious danger of this plausible sectarian religionism, which is doing the work of the various latitudinarian heresies, with the advantage of an odor and sanction which they never possessed, and which crippled their power for evil—namely—the odor and sanction of the soundest orthodoxy.

METHODISM IN LOUISIANA.

We copy from the Nashville Advocate the following from its New Orleans correspondent, as perfectly harmonizing with our own views: "The Louisiana Conference stands almost alone amongst all the Conferences, as exhibiting a decrease in membership. The general increase is gratifying. Thousands—tens of thousands—have been added in the other States, but we have not held our own. Notwithstanding the figures are against us, our brethren are convinced that there has been an increase during the past year. There were causes operating against a large increase in some parts—specially the southern, where the yellow fever prevailed nearly five months. In the numbers reported and furnished to the book editor are the actual reports of this year. From some works there were no reports probably furnished the Conference Secretary, but the change in the plans and extent of the circuits and missions, from the previous year, made it impossible to supply the defect by reference to the reports of the year before. This in itself is sufficient to account for the apparent decrease of membership. Then we are to take into account that nearly every year many of our circuits and missions are not only so changed that no reliance can be placed upon past reports, but are left out of the plans, or left to be supplied for want of men. Owing to these causes, it happens that societies organized and gathered one year are lost from the statistics another. Our actual colored membership probably much exceeds the reported number, owing to the fact that some missions and portions of missions are discontinued from time to time; and specially that last year the colored work was as much as possible incorporated with the white, not to the permanent injury of the former, but occasioning for the time defects and inaccuracies in the statistics.

"Owing to various circumstances, the aggressive movements of the Gospel in Louisiana are slow. The laborer here must have long patience. Casting his bread upon the waters, the faith that ventures and the patience that waits must be his. The character of the people, their employments, wealth, descent, and sparseness of white population, conspire to make the progress of the gospel slow. The country cannot be taken by storm. Rather it must be conquered by the labored parallels and gradual approaches of siege. In the older States—in your own Tennessee—your revivals sweep whole communities. You have the denser population, numerous village communities for centres of operations, hereditary Protestantism, and nurtured Methodism, which we have not. Besides, the itinerancy here has always been short-handed. There are fields white to the harvest, in which many laborers, doing but little in over-crowded Conferences, might receive wages. Everywhere men are needed, and, to adopt a hackneyed phrase, "men of the right sort."

Now this "right sort" has its own meaning for this latitude, as elsewhere. Refinement, intelligence, wealth, worldliness, are to be found in town and country alike; and the minister, to be eminently useful, needs those varied resources which will enable him to meet the demands of the acutest opposition and the highest social intelligence. The colored missions are not exceptions. The missionary must command the respect of the planters and their families, if he would achieve permanent success. He must be as much at home, and as capable of magnifying his office in the mansion of the master, as in the cabin of the slave. Ignorance, inexperience, and the want of those social refinements, which commend the man in cultivated society, are in the way of ministerial usefulness. In communities—of which there are more in Louisiana than elsewhere—where Methodism is not understood, and where there is little or no sympathy for the preacher, the preacher becomes the sole exponent of the Church, and the planting of the gospel depends greatly upon the personal fitness of the man. The harmlessness of the dove must be blended with the wisdom of the serpent; intelligence and education must be combined with the purest flame of piety. There are two sides to instrumentalities—the human and the divine. The fishermen of Galilee were not specially chosen for the Gentiles. For this work regard was had to human fitness, and Saul of Tarsus was set apart to expound the gospel to the Greek and the Roman. There are some almost virgin fields in Louisiana yet to be occupied, and new ground to be broken, but men of this "right sort" are wanting to possess the land.

A protracted meeting of considerable interest was recently concluded in Algiers, in that beautiful church which Bishop Pierce dedicated two years ago. Thirty were converted, and upwards of forty added to the Church. There is no special revival influence in our other churches, but full houses, and rather more than the usual interest and accessions.

The question is often asked, How many Methodist churches are there in the city? There are more than three. In the city and suburbs are seven American, five German, and three colored—altogether fifteen. In Gretna, on the right bank, and opposite the Fourth District, some eligible lots have just been paid for, and a church will soon be put upon them, and another enterprise of a more costly and important character will be heard of in due time.

DUTIES OF CHRISTIAN MASTERS. *

The principal excellence of an author is not merely that his theme is intrinsically valuable, and his treatment of it adequately thorough and able; but, also, that it is appropriate to the circumstances and the time. "Doth not wisdom" continually "cry, and understanding put forth her voice?" But "a word spoken in due season, how good is it?" The small and handsome volume which suggests this paper, has the triple merit of a valuable theme, an able treatment, and an opportune time.

The relation of master and servant, with the various and antagonistic questions and discussions which grow out of it, is of deeper and more universal interest, at the present time, than any other subject, moral, political, or social. The present treatise, so far as known, is the first and only one devoted to the specific, and confessedly most solemn and important, phase of the subject in question. Not the least element in its appropriateness and interest is the fact that this first effort of the kind in behalf of the servile race, is from the slaveholding section—from a slaveholder—a member of that Church which has devoted herself peculiarly to the ecclesiastical protectorship and spiritual welfare of masters and servants; an effort, too, which interested opponents have tauntingly asserted could never be made in the South.

"A year ago the American Tract Society, after much deliberation, took steps for publishing something on the Duties of Masters to Servants. That large and benevolent association, having many constituents and beneficiaries in the Southern portion of the Union, though sustained and managed chiefly at the North, went so far as to have a volume, with that title, printed at its house in New York—but it was never published. A jealous and powerful public opinion forbade the Society to proceed. 'The North' it was said, 'does not need tracts on this subject, and the South will not have them from the North.' The merits of the supposed volume never entered into the question. It was enought that a voluntary Society, whose head-quarters and directory were in non-slaveholding States, and many of whose influential supporters and directors were avowed abolitionists, had resolved to publish anything on this subject for circulation in the slave holding States. The policy entered upon once, would end—none knew where. Not from that quarter would Southern masters hear anything on that subject. This response was plain and emphatic. A Society, national in its extent, undertook to supply a sectional want, and that, too, upon a subject about which evangelical christians on different sides of a certain line were hopelessly disagreed. Its directors had the wisdom and courage to recede from the position when they saw it would destroy the integrity of the Society, and in this they have been sustained by its best friends, North and South."

But the South will bear her own sons. She will speak for herself on this subject, and show that she not only understands her duties in the premises better than others, but that she is as much disposed to perform them, as she is opposed to foreign and sinister instruction. Be it remembered, too, that she has not been unwillingly urged to consider this subject by the fear of reproach from having forbidden others to do it for her. "In 1849 the Baptist State Convention of Alabama offered a premium of $200 for the best Essay on the Duties of Christian Masters to their Servants; and assigned the duty of making the award to a committee selected from the leading denominations of the Southern and South-western States. Over forty Essays were submitted to the committee, which recommended that the premium be equally divided between the authors of two of them"—"Duties of Christian Masters," by Rev. H. N. McTyeire, of New Orleans, and "Melville Letters," by Rev. C. F. Sturgis, of Greesboro, Alabama. Dr. McTyeire's present work is the mature development of the more limited one of ten years ago. In addition to the enlargement and revision of the original work, there are four letters from Bishop Andrew, on "the Religious Instruction of Negroes," first published in the New Orleans Christian Advocate in the year 1856, and reproduced in this form by the consent of the venerable author. There is added, also, "Humble Annals," containing a number of sketches, illustrative of the power of the gospel among the negroes, in transforming their lives, and in giving them victory over the fear of death.

This work will have a wide circulation. In the South, no subject is more important than the one it treats. Candid Northern men will be anxious to know how we think and speak among ourselves of the rights of slaves, and of the duties of masters to them. In slaveholding society, no two elements of public opinion have been more rapidly developed of late years than, the conviction that slavery is right, and the consciousness of responsibility to God for the discharge of the duties connected with the relation of master. They are correlative. Little was done for negroes in the days when even slaveholders doubted the legitimacy of the institution. Now, in the South, where the people generally believe in the scripturalness of the relation, as they do in that of husband and wife, General Conferences, Annual Conferences, General Assemblies, Synods, Associations, Missionary Societies, gravely include the religious culture of the blacks as among the great interests of religion and civilization. It is one of the themes of the Statesman and orator. The literature of the country, like the Bible, has its recognition interwoven. While in the North, the free negroes, as a general rule, can truly say, "no man careth for my soul." The South is doing as much for the slaves as the North will permit her to do. The demon of abolitionism was the cause of the loss of the "first estate" of the American negroes. Its prevalence was their "fall," and their "redemption" must be accomplished by a victory over its "total depravity." Nothing, comparatively, can be done for them, as free, so-called. As slaves, only, can they be saved and civilized. There never ought to have been any so-called free States. There never ought to have been an anti-slavery party. Besides the harm they have done and are now doing the country, they have been the curse of the negro. Treated as a natural element of society, as the Bible treats it—making the master and head of the family the patriarch of his tribe—without the suspicion and bitterness occasioned by abolitionism—the negroes of the United States would have been, in a much greater degree than now, the happiest and most serenely contented laboring people upon the earth. But sin is in the world, and abolitionism is in the United States; and, with the Bible and the grace of God to help us, we must do the best we can against both of them—to convert the world, and to save the negroes. We hail Dr. McTyeire's book as a valuable assistant in the accomplishment of both. It is not only able in itself, but, also, "representative" in its philosophy. It speaks the sentiments of Southern Christians.

* Duties of Christian Masters. By H. N. McTyeire, D. D. Edited by Thomas O. Summers, D. D., Nashville, Tennessee, Southern Methodist publishing House, 1859.

War in Europe, it is said, is inevitable. We do not believe they will fight.

OLD SCHOOL PRESBYTERIANS AND SLAVERY.

Our gifted brother of the Texas Christian Advocate, is charitable as well as clear-headed—not an unusual combination. On the subject indicated by the head of this article, among other things, he says: "The old and New School Presbyterians are in a controversy about slavery. Dr. Newton, a New School minister, of Mississippi, proves from the record that the Old School Church has opposed 'the institution' from the beginning. What is to be done? Our opinion is that the Presbyterians of the South, Old and New School, are "sound" on the important question involved. The Southern people have faith in them. The 'record' was made, in part, at least when it was supposed by many good men even at the South that slavery could be defended no otherwise than as a necessary and temporary evil. Probably, too, a part of it was made under the influence of the one-man power. Dr. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, has been, it is said "omnipotent in the assemblies" of the Old School Church. He is a conscientous abolitionist. His influence, and the past prevalence of mistaken views about slavery, have probably led the Old School Church into a dilemma. She must, it is said, either consent to be regarded as an anti-slavery church, or she must ignore the record. Nobody expects the Old Church to alter or amend, directly, anything that has been "put down;" if she said the quadruped was sixteen feet high, she is not going to unsay it, but we do not suppose she intends to re-affirm it after she is convinced of the error. But has not the South a right to expect that Southern Presbyterians will stop the descent and entallment of this official action against slavery? The facts are, first, that the church record is decidedly against slavery, and, secondly, that as late as May, 1858, the Presbyterian Assembly declared that it saw "no occasion to revise the constant and unalterable faith" of their church on that subject. Now, the Southern Presbyterians are not, as we have already said, opposed to slavery. They hold slaves, and make, we believe, the very best of masters: they are reputed to be as conscientious in the effort to bring their slaves under the influence of family religion, as we know they are in many other duties of Christianity. This being true, it is but fair to expect the passage of a resolution in the General Assembly to break the force of that old 'one in which they declare that slavery is a 'blot on our religion' and determine to use "exertions" to "effect" its 'TOTAL ABOLITION.'"

We, also, think it incumbent on Southern Presbyterians, who are, as we think, as sound on the scriptural view of slavery as any of us, to place themselves right on this question. The Presbyterian Church in the United States is now in precisely the same relation to slavery that the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States was before the division. And while we have the same confidence in the soundness of Southern Presbyterians that we have in that of Southern Methodists, Northern Presbyterians have no more right to promulgate their views in the South than Northern Methodists have. Bishop Janes, who presided at the recent Northern Conference in Texas, which was prematurely adjourned by the action of the people, is just as acceptable in the South as Dr. Breckenridge. And the anti-slavery resolutions proposed at this Northern Conference in Texas, were no more objectionable than the "deliverances" of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. Both the Methodist and Presbyterian Churches made the unfortunate mistake, in early times, of legislating on this subject. But two modes of escape from the dilemma are possible: recission or division. With us, the first, though right, and best, was impossible—and we chose the last. Let not Southern Presbyterians be led into the mistake of boasting of "union and conservatism," when every body knows the character of their "deliverances," which they refuse to change.

MEETING OF THE BOARD.

Much of our time, the past week, says the Nashville Advocate was taken up in the annual meeting of the Missionary Board. The different parts of the Church were well represented by the Bishops and assistant treasurers.

The sum of $191,500 was appropriated to be drawn for by the Bishops for the support of foreign and domestic missions during the next year. This amount provides contingently for opening a mission station in Japan, and another in Central or South America.

The Board recommended the Bishop having charge of that work to appoint Rev. W. Cunnyngham Superintendent of the China Mission. The title "Presiding Elder" was suggested by a member of the Board, as better understood among us, and more proper; but Superintendent was adhered to.

An enlargement of the work is looked to in that direction. Bishop Pierce, who has charge of that field, has accepted the services of Rev. Messrs. Allen, of Georgia; Wood, of North Carolina; and Stewart of Florence, Alabama, for the China Mission. One or more of these has yet to be ordained, and this cannot be done till an election to orders by an Annual Conference. Consequently, they cannot leave so soon as was expected. They are instructed to make good use of the time between this and the meeting of the Conferences, by visiting as missionaries, and diffusing spirit and information on the subject; and making collections for their cause.

In the absence of Bishop Pierce, on the Pacific coast, Bishop Early is charged with all that relates to our missions in China. Those who have any communications to make in that department will address him, for the time.

The Board ordered that all drafts hereafter shall be drawn on the Treasurer at Nashville. Through the assistant Treasurer he will make such arrangements as may be expedient for accommodating the holders of drafts residing at a distance.

A standing committee of five was appointed to gather and digest information on all foreign fields which it may be considered proper for our Church to enter upon or withdraw from. Such committee will lay the results of its labors and investigations before the Board for shaping its final action. It will place the Board, at every meeting, in possession of facts, pertinent and suggestive. The appointment of such a committee was moved by one of the Bishops, and carried with unanimity. It is expected to supply a felt want, and we trust much good will come of it.

The annual meeting for the election of officers and managers was held in McKendree Church, Monday evening, 18th. The report was read by the Corresponding Secretary. Bishop Early presided. Drs. Myers and Lee made brief and appropriate addresses. It was judged best to take up no collection. The senior Superintendent, Bishop Soule, was re-elected President, assisted by his colleagues as Vice-Presidents, and a few others, with an efficent Board of Managers.

LETTER FROM THE MISSIONARY SECRETARY.

Mobile, May 2, 1859.

Mr. Editor—I write you a line as to our recent visit to Alabama, and our Missionary Anniversary held in this city on the 1st inst.

At Montgomery Dr. Huston and myself spent the Sabbath; and after the morning sermon by Bro. Huston and the services at night, collections were taken, amounting in the aggregate to more than $1100, nearly double the amount raised last year by the same church. This is the first Missionary meeting and collection since the adjournment of the annual meeting of the Board and Bishops; and we take pleasure in announcing through your paper—the organ of the Alabama Conference—this cheering fact to the Church; that in this first collection, we witness a fair promise for the collections of the year.

We were kindly met at the depot in Montgomery by Drs. Mitchell and Hamilton, and escorted to our homes, Dr. Huston at Bro. Thernington's, and myself at Bro. Jones, where we met with a kind reception and shared in the hospitalities of those families so well known to the Church. There is a happy prospect of a precious revival in Montgomery.

The next point of our journey was Summerfield, the residence of Bishop Andrew, and of our good lay Brother, Hon. R. A. Baker—also the location of two fine academies, male and female, Revs. Connerly and Montgomery, principals. The great point of attraction here was the Sabbath-school celebration, which was really one of the most interesting we ever attended. Both departments of the collegiate Institute united in the celebration. It is one of the largest Sabbath-schools in the South, over four hundred in number. Speaking exercises were held in the church; speeches from Dr. Huston and the writer, the former making one of his happiest efforts. The closing speeches were, an address from Bro. Fitts, presenting Dr. Huston a silver pitcher on behalf of the scholars and teachers; the speech and the reply were both most appropriate.

The congregation passed from the church to the adjoining grove, where a most sumptuous repast had been prepared by the ladies. Seldom have we seen anything more tastefully gotten up, or a meeting of the kind which seemed to give more universal satisfaction. Bishop Andrew opened the meeting with prayer, and seemed greatly to enjoy the exercises. His heart is warm towards the great cause of Sabbath-schools, as is evidenced in the fact that when at home he is himself one of the teachers of the school. May God long spare him to us! The Bishop has here a most delightful home, an inviting place after the cares and toils of an active and laborious life.

At Selma we spent a night, preaching for our friend, Dr. Wadsworth, and sharing in the hospitalities of his home. There is at present the commencement of a precious revival in his church.

But I hasten to say we reached Mobile; Bishop Andrew, Dr. Huston and myself, accompanied by Bro. Baker and family.

Here we were met and taken to the house of Bro. Goodman, where we were all made to feel at home.

The meeting of the committee of the Book Depository, and the Missionary Anniversary, called together a large number of members of the Conference, and some visiting friends from abroad.

The churches in the morning were filled with patient and attentive listeners to the word of God.

In the afternoon the Missionary prayer-meeting was held in the St. Francis street church. A large number were present. Bishop Andrew led the meeting, and in opening delivered one of the most soul-stirring and appropriate addresses, on the subject of Missions, I have heard. Prayers were offered by a number of brethren, and the deepest feeling was manifested by the whole assembly. This was a fine preparatory meeting to our Anniversary, which was held at night, in the Franklin street church.

At this meeting a large congregation crowded the house. The meeting was presided over by Bishop Andrew—Dr. Dorman acting as Secretary.

I send you his report of the meeting, from which you and your readers will see the order of the exercises.

Many had feared and expressed themselves that the collection would be small, falling far below the wishes of the friends of the cause. But we are gratified to announce to the contrary. Yes, Mobile has sustained the reputation of the Alabama Conference, as the first one on the list of Conferences for Missionary collections. The collection amounted to more than $4200, and now, while I am writing has been increased to near $4400.

Well done, Mobile! Well done, Alabama!

Thus, my dear brother, we give out they key-note for Missionary collections in the South. May appropriate responses from every city, from every appointment in every Conference cheer the Church!

There was no undue effort, no false appeal. It was a noble offering to God on the altar of Missions, springing from a deep sense of duty.

Twelve hundred and twelve dollars of the amount was given to the support of a missionary in China; one thousand for a Mission in Central America, and one thousand for a Home or City Mission in Mobile. May kind heaven bless all the donors!

E. W. Sehon.

The Fourteenth Anniversary of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, was held in the Franklin street Methodist Church in this city. Bishop Andrew presiding.

On motion of Dr. Hamilton, T. W. Dorman was appointed Secretary.

The meeting was opened with religious services by the Rev. Dr. Keener of New Orleans. Bishop Andrew announced the object of the meeting, and introduced the Rev. Dr. Sehon, Secretary of the Parent Society, who read the Annual Report—a very able and interesting paper, surveying the ground of our Missionary operations, at home and abroad, and the condition and prospects of the Society.

On motion of Thos. W. Dorman the report was adopted.

Bishop Andrew then rose and addressed the meeting in his own peculiarly forcible and impressive style, advocating the cause of Missions, and showing the obligations of the church and the country at large to the Missionary cause.

Dr. Hamilton presented the following resolution, seconded by Dr. Huston, of the Kentucky Conference:

Resolved, That the signs of the times indicate the near approach of an extraordinary development of the power of God, in the salvation of the world.

Which he advocated in a brief, but pertinent speech.

Dr. Huston followed, in an able and more elaborate address, in the advocacy of the resolution, which was listened to with intense interest by the large and attentive audience.

Dr. Keener presented the following resolution, which was seconded by Dr. Sehon, in an able and effective speech, urging a liberal response on part of the congregation:

Resolved, That in view of the present condition of the world, and the demand that is made upon the church—it is the sacred duty of each individual Christian to put forth prompt and continuous exertions to send the gospel to all the nations of the world.

The collection was then taken up, amounting in cash and subscription to the very handsome sum of $4,212 15, the largest ever taken at any previous meeting of the Society.

The meeting adjourned with the benediction of Bishop Andrew.

Thos. W. Dorman, Secretary.

Rev. Wm. H. Milburn, as we see by the appointments of the New York East Conference, is returned to the Pacific Street M. E. Church. Whether he is a "member" or a "supply," is not stated.

WHAT ARE THE BAPTISTS GOING TO DO?

The last Mississippi Baptist, in an article headed with this question, says: "This is a question that is often asked in reference to the coming Biennial Convention. But it is one not so easily answered; for, from the signs of the times, we apprehend serious results from the action of that body. It is useless for us to ignore the fact that there are at least two parties, respectable for their numbers, who are looking forward to the meeting of the body with some hopes, at least, of having their position and principles sustained; and, for brevity's sake, we will call them the Howell and Graves' parties. Now, if we understand the position assumed by each of these parties, it is, that both of these men cannot be recognized in this body; and still, both these men intend making application for admission as members. Each have their friends, and those friends think that great and cardinal principles are involved in the decision of their respective claims. Now what is the Convention to do?—What can it do to satisfy the parties?—This is the question.

"Our advice, therefore, to the Convention is, to reject both parties—asking no questions, and allowing no discussion of the respective claims of either party—ignoring the strife about Nashville, wholly. Nor do we think that the persons implicated in this matter ought to complain, especially when interests of such magnitude are at stake."

If we might be permitted to give our brother the advice that naturally suggests itself to an outsider, we would say: Instead of trying "to satisfy the parties after the manner of bargaining politicians who bid both North and South—stand by your "democratic platform, the freedom of popular elections, and the will of the majority, and let matters drive. Now is the time to test Baptist "capacity for self-government," on the chosen principles, and the sooner the result is known the better for them and the rest of the Christian world. Methodists are interested in a fair trial of those principles. The result might be a most instructive commentary on the form of Church government which our Baptist brethren have so benevolently, so and so persistently urged upon us. No dodging, brother Freeman, we entreat you. Let us have the benefit of the lesson to be derived from an "administration" strictly according to the principles laid down in the "platform." Your "banner" has been floating in the breeze for a long time; do not haul it down in the thickest of the fight. Your historical "martyrs" would not have demeaned themselves thus. "O for an hour of Dundee!"

FIRST JAPAN MINISTER TO WASHINGTON.

The first Japanese Minister to Washington—The course taken from Japan—A United States Officer Acting Cicerone. Hints for their Treatment, etc., etc., etc.

Hong Kong, China, Feb. 14, 1859.

It gives me pleasure to inform you that the steamer Mississippi left to-day for Simodin, Japan, whence after resuming her poop deck and cabin, she will proceed to Jeddo for the purpose of taking on board the Japanese minister and suite, and then depart with them for Panama, by way of Sandywich Islands. It is to be hoped that the Secretary of the Navy will have consideration enough for the dignity of these strangers, and the important mission which they are coming, to have a steamer ready to meet them at Aspinwall, and, on their arrival at New York to convey them direct to Washington, to avoid their exposure to a large crowd in Broadway, which would certainly be attracted by their peculiar costume and appearance. Lieutenant Habersham goes in charge of the which is deemed a very necessary step, as they will be strangers of a very peculiar character to our countrymen, and the great sensation and curiosity they will naturally arouse might prove an annoyance to them, there be not proper and judicious persons to direct their movements.

U. S. Steam-frigate Mississippi,
Hong Kong, Feb. 13, 1859.

The most important news I have to communicate to you—that is, it is good news to me—is, that we are homeward bound. We leave this port this morning for home, by way of Japan and Cape Horn. The Commodore has ordered us to proceed to Kannanary, in Jeddo Bay forthwith; and on arriving there, we will make a proper arrangements for receiving on board the first Japanese Ambassador that ever visited the United States, together with his suite, consisting of fourteen individuals, who, I presume, will create quite a sensation when they land in New York, with their odd dresses and swords. The frigate Powhatan will follow us in a few days, for the purpose of bringing us a supply of coal to make up the deficiency on the passage from this port to the Bay of Jedda. We shall then proceed with our guests to Honolulu, San Francisco and Panama, when Lieutenant Hubersham, of the Powhatan, who goes in that ship for that purpose, will take charge of, and conduct them to the City of Washington. My own impression is, that in less than four months a Japanese Minister and suite will be making their salaam before the President of the White House. I have this from the best authority. If they meet with one half the attentions (?), fuss and feathers, etc., that greeted the great (?) Hungarian a few years back, they will be forcibly struck with the difference between the quiet dignity of their own country and the boisterous and hearty welcome of the Western world. [New York Herald, April 23d.

WHO SHALL BE BISHOP?

A New York correspondent of the Texas Christian Advocate says: "Who shall be Bishop begins to be discussed. Dr. Clarke of the Ladies Repository is much talked of. He is a devoted man, and a scholar—graduate of the Wesleyan University in the day of Dr. Fisk. Dr. Porter of the Book-room would suit the Yankee best, still ultras do not think him ultra enough on Slavery. He himself thinks that he is as sound as a man, on that head. Dr. Jesse Peck has been frequently named for the Episcopal office in California. Pious, intelligent, and laborious, he would be an excellent selection for that distant region.' Then the German Methodists require a German for Bishop. Dr. Nast is a very pious and learned man. At the Evangelical alliance in Europe a few years ago, Dr. Krummacher, the Court Preacher, with others, thanked the Doctor personally for his clear and comprehensive information of American Methodism. The Germans among us are becoming very numerous, especially at the West, as to demand especial care and attention."

Visitors, from among our ministerial brethren of various sections, have cheered our sanctum, more than usually, of late. Accompanying Bishop Pierce, was Rev. Dr. Thos. H. Dawson and his amiable lady, from Columbus, Ga. The Doctor preached, to the delight of the Felicity-street congregation. Next, Rev. I. G. Jones, of the Texas Conference, on his way from Kentucky home. Next, Rev. Fountain Pitts Ray, of the Texas Conference, on his way to Tennessee, to see his father, after an absence of ten years. Next, Rev. S. J. Davies, of the Louisiana Conference, who preached an capital sermon in Felicity, last Sabbath evening.

Rev. James C. Wilson, the "original" of that "Peculiar Sketch of a Texas Preacher," which had such a rapid "run" in the papers, from Maine to California, is, we are sorry to learn, compelled to quit preaching on account of ill-health. This is not the first instance in which a gifted man has laid himself aside by intolerable labors during the first year. Another friend, young, zealous, and eloquent, comes to mind in this connection.

The Home Circle for May comes, as it should, by the first of the month. Rev. J. B. Cottrell, of the Alabama Conference, continues his valuable series on the Institution of Children to the Church. Drs. Hanner and Lee have a place in the present number. The editor, in addition to his fine editorial department, has a place among the contributors. Other contributors in plenty. Subscribe for the Home Circle, Nashville, $2,00 a year.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Union Town Colored Mission.—Rev. J. W. MCCANN writes: "I send you the report for the First and Second Quarters. This Mission embraces a part of the Dayton Colored Mission, as it stood last year, and the appointment that was connected with the Union Town Station. I have not been able yet to do much, on account of the bad roads; however the mud does not keep me from my appointments. I have not as yet been able to fill out my work; there are a great many large plantations that have no preaching, and it is some distance to any church. If they are allowed to go to church, there are some old ones that are not able to walk through the mud five or six miles, and the children are not catechized. This I regard as very important work. Some men out of the church, have felt their responsibility. One said he did not care for preaching himself, but he might have to meet the responsibility. There are some in the church that wait upon the administration of the word from Sabbath to Sabbath, and their servants are neglected, when probably twenty-five cents on the bale of cotton would pay a preacher for preaching once a month."

Arcola Colored Mission.—Rev. JOHN WILLIAMSON sends a report for the Second Quarter. "This Mission is in Mareago County, Alabama, in the bounds of the Demopolis District. Two of its former patrons decline employing the Missionary this year, and to fill up the work I have taken in two new appointments, making in all, ten, which are filled every four weeks, all on the Sabbath. And where there is lively interest felt and plainly manifested by the owners or superintendants of this people, our labors are profitable, but where there is neither interest manifested nor sympathy given to our efforts, our success must and will be limited. The habits and character of this people, and the circumstances by which they are surrounded, should constantly and strongly appeal to the heart of the owners and superintendents in behalf of co-operation with the Missionary."

German Creek Colored Mission.—"This Mission," writes Rev. A. R. RAMSAY, "is improving. We have had some three or four conversions this quarter, and others manifest deep concern for salvation. Three at Bro. Nelson's plantation have died, leaving behind them the consolation that they rest with Jesus. One appointment transfered from this Mission to Arcola Colored Mission, and one discontinued. Two have been added to the work, so that it remains the same as last year as to members, etc."

Tensaloosa Circuit.—Rev. J. T. ADERHOLT writes: "My charge is in a flourishing condition. I am also happy to state that the New Orleans Christian Advocate is making a fine impression in the families who take it, and I think I shall be able to get at least twenty-five new subscribers in the bounds of this Circuit."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Biloxi District.—Rev. R. J. JONES, P. E., writes: "I have just closed my First Quarterly meeting, for the second round, on the Raleigh Circuit—and a glorious meeting it was! Nineteen joined on probation, and we had a number of conversions. Bro. J. A. Vance, the preacher in charge, aided by Bro. Lack, a local preacher, commenced to preach several nights before the Quarterly meeting proper. Bro. Vence seems to be doing a fine work on the Raleigh Circuit, and, instrumental in the conversion of many souls, and in adding many to the Church. He has received some, more or less, at every appointment, save one, on the Circuit. At one place, Mount Zion, he received thirty-three at one protracted meeting, and the greater portion of them were happily converted. He has added to the Church, on probation, in all, eighty-seven souls—which I think is doing well—up to the 10th of April. I thank God, the prospect seems to be brightening once more on Raleigh Circuit. The prospects were somewhat encouraging all around the District during the first round. We are hoping and praying for a general revival.

On account of the great abundance of rain through the winter and spring, I was compelled to miss two of my Quarterly meetings. The preachers seem to be taking hold in the right way."

Coffeeville Circuit.—Rev. M. D. FLY writes: "I had the pleasure of accompanying Bro. R., the junior preacher on the Coffeeville Circuit, to his regular appointments on last Saturday and Sabbath. God blessed his word. I have never seen so universal a triumph! From the father in Israel to the babe in Christ—all were made to rejoice."

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Algiers.—A Member writes: Uniting with Rev. Richardson, Rev. Lillistom, and others, we have continued and closed a protracted meeting at Algiers Church in this city. According to the account of the preacher in charge, it has resulted in fifty additions to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and about thirty-five conversions.

Wansboro Circuit.—Rev. T. H. MCCLENDON writes: We have just closed our Quarterly meeting at Oakly Church God was present. Four joined the Church, and Many found it was good to be there.

EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE.

Coffeeville Circuit.—Rev. J. B. RAUN writes: Under the blessings of God, we have arrived in our new field of labor. Coffeeville circuit embraces a section of country comparatively new, yet being densely populated with the most enterprising citizens Georgia and Alabama Conference afford. But a few years can pass, before this section shall emphatically be the stronghold of this Conference. While we wander up and down in this beautiful country, we shall remember the companion of our former ministry, the New Orleans Advocate. So as a poor beginning we send you the name of a new subscriber.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

By the Africa—Approaching Crisis in Europe.

LIVERPOOL, April 16.—All accounts from France concur in respect to the vast military preparations being made, and the great activity that prevails in every department of the military and naval service of France.

Immense quantities of arms, ammunition and all kinds of warlike materiels are being accumulated at Marseilles.

Five additional steam frigates have been dispatched to Algiers for the purpose, as is supposed, of bringing back troops.

Three gun-boats have been ordered to proceed from Cherbourg to the Adriatic sea immediately.

The Memorial Diplomatique newspaper which has been expected for some time, has been allowed to resume its issues.

Lord Cowley is at Paris still, engaged in negotiations for a pacific adjustment of the difficulties by attempting to establish a basis upon which all the powers can agree to meet in the Peace Congress. He has had several interviews with Count Wolowiski upon the subject, which showed that very serious differences existed between France and England, as to the proper mode of settlement.

The Arch Duke Albrecht of Austria, had gone to Berlin on a special mission, and a perfect understanding, it is supposed, is about to be established between Austria and Prussia.

Warlike preparations are continued on a large scale in Austria and some of the smaller German States. The Bavarian army has been placed on a war footing.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Times says that the Germans will not spill a drop of blood for the purpose of aiding Austria to maintain her special treaties in Italy or for the Austrian concordat.

The political prisoners at Naples have received pass-ports for the United States, and will soon leave Italy for their destination.

Twenty-one shocks of an earthquake had been felt at Vienna. They were not, however, severe and no damage was done.

There were reports in circulation again that the King of Naples was either dead or at the point of death.

It is reported that Holland and Belgium had concluded a treaty for mutual defense in case of war breaking out.

Arrival of the North Breton.

The North Breton brings advices one day later than those by the Bremen. Nothing important in the news. Cotton had slightly declined.....The British Parliament was dissolved 19th April.....Sardinia accepts the proposition to disarm simultaneously with Austria, preparatory to a peace congress. France concurs, in condition that Sardinia, and the other Italian States be admitted to the negotiations of the peace congress. But the warlike preparations, especially in France, continue at a fearful rate.....The illness of the King of Naples is pronounced beyond recovery.

DOMESTIC.

Serious Riot at Panama.

NEW YORK, April 30.—The Vanderbilt steamship Northern Light arrived at this port to-day from Aspinwall, and brings advices from Panama to the 21st inst.

A riot broke out at Panama on Palm Sunday evening, of so serious a character that Commodore Long, of the Pacific squadron, sent an officer with a company of marines on shore, for the purpose of protecting American citizens and property, but the disturbances were quelled by the local authorities, and the services of the United States marines were not needed.

Washington Items.

WASHINGTON, April 29.—Cobden, ex-member of Parliament and the Liberal party in England, has arrived at Washington and is the guest of the President.

Nicaragua Affairs.

WASHINGTON, April 26.—No dispatches were received from Gen. Lamar, our Nicaraguan Minister, by the last two steamers from Aspinwall.

Jerez, the Nicaraguan Minister at Washington, has notified Secretary Cass that the Charter of the American, Atlantic and Pacific Ship Canal Company has been declared forfeited by the Nicaraguan Congress for non-fulfillment of its obligations.

The Pike Peak Mines.

LEAVENWORTH, K. T., April 29.—The reports received here from the Piko Peak mines continue favorable. The richest prospects are in the vicinity of Park Arrapahoe, but the ground at that place is still frozen.

The Steamship Washington.

NEW YORK, April 30.—Fears are entertained for the safety of the steamship Washington, which left here some time since for California. She is a long time overdue at San Francisco, and nothing has been heard of her since her departure.

Sonora Expedition—Battle between Indian Tribes.

ST. LOUIS, April 30.—A telegraph dispatch from Independence to the St. Louis Republican, reports that the emigrants for Pike's Peek gold mines, scattered along the route, are rallying into companies with a view of joining the Arizone and Sonora expedition.

The same dispatch also reports that a battle occurred on the 2d instant, near Zuni, between the Nevajo and Apachs Indians, in which ten of the latter and eight of the former were killed.

The Nevajoes also lost 4000 sheep. The Zuni Indians assisted the Apaches at the battle.

Mormon Difficulties—Dispatches from Gen. Johnston:

WASHINGTON, April 30.—Official dispatches have been received from Col. Johnston, of the Utah army, which explain satisfactorily the troubles which have arisen between the different authorities of the Territory and the Mormons. From these dispatches it appears that Gov. Cumming was acting under the State Department, and attempting to carry out orders directly opposite to the instructions of Col. Johnston and the judicial officers.

Mountain Meadow Massacre—17 Children Exempt.

WASHINGTON, April 30.—Dr. Forney, the Superintendent of Utah Indian Affairs, says that there is no doubt that the Mormons are implicated and took part in the massacre of Mountain Meadow. Seventeen children who escaped the massacre are in the care of Dr. Forney, who is about to restore them to their friends in Arkansas. The Cabinet held a meeting to-day, in which the state of affairs in Utah was under consideration.

Late and Interesting from Utah.

The following is an extract from a letter from a gentleman in Utah, dated March 31, 1859, to his friend in this city: There is now a small chance for a difficulty with the Mormons. Judge Cradlebaugh has called on Gen. Johnston for some troops, as a posse to guard prisoners, &c. Gen. Johnston sent him all he asked for, and they are now encamped in the vicinity of Provo city. Gov. Cumming objects to the troops being there.

The grand jury failed or refused to find bills against the most notorious criminals, and Judge C. discharged the jury.

Those people are determined not to obey the law, and refuse to punish offenders against it. All kinds of crimes have been committed, and they will not find a bill against a Mormon, although the proof is positive. Evidence against persons high in the Church has been found which connects them with the Mountain Meadows affair, where the Arkansas people were killed. Property taken from them is in the Territory. The Indians declare that the Mormons directed and assisted in it, and that after the train was taken the plunder was not divided with them in a fair manner, as had been agreed on.

Judge Cradlebaugh says that he has taken an unusual course in charging the jury, as he has mentioned these criminals by name, and told them of the evidence that has be produced. He does this in order that there may be no excuse for them in not attending to their duty.

I think it possible that evidence will be discovered that will implicate Brigham Young in serious offenses. Something is looking out daily that may give a direct clue to matters now well covered up. Judge Cradlebaugh is determined, I think, that the law shall be enforced or that the blame shall fall on the proper persons. General Johnson will no doubt afford him all legal assistance.

THE WAR PROSPECTS.—Baron Humboldt, the confidential adviser of the Prince Regent of Prussia, writes to a diplomatic correspondent at Washington, that war cannot be postponed beyond July. The Washington correspondent of the New York Herald says: The State Department is in receipt of letters brought by the last European steamer, from our Ministers in England, France, Rudrid and Vienna. The indications, writes Messrs. Dallas and Mason, are anything but peaceful. The impression is universal among leading men that a general European war will sooner or later convulse the entire continent of Europe; that the Peace Congress which is to assemble may postpone, but cannot prevent it.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, May 5, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New-Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 30th ult.: The operations of the past week have been to but a moderate extent in our leading commodities generally, and it will be seen that Cotton has moved but slowly at the decline noticed in the early part of the week. In Tobacco, also, the transactions have been less extensive, but the supply has been less ample, while the enquiry has been fair. Sugar and Molasses have continued to meet with ready sale and a marked advance has taken place in the latter article within the past few days. In the various articles of Western Produce the movement generally is on a moderate scale, though we notice greater firmness in the prices of some articles.

On Wednesday morning European advices five days later than those by the steamer City of Washington were before the public, brought by the steamer Circassian, from Liverpool for New York 18th instant, which vessel was intercepted off Cape Race. The advices respecting Cotton present no marked change, the decline of 1-16 to ⅛d, reported by the City of Washington, being confirmed, the greatest falling off being in the lower qualities. The week's sales at Liverpool summed up 43,000 bales, and the quotations given are 8⅛d for Fair Orleans and 7 5-16d for Middling. The total stock at Liverpool was 407,000 bales, of which 341,000 bales were American. Some improvement is noticed in the trade at Manchester and other manufacturing districts, from the Continent. At Havre there had been an advance in franc, free ordinaire being quoted at 108 francs. The week's sales were reported at 16,000 bales and the stock on hand was estimated at 100,000 bales.

The river continues to rise, and is considerably above the highest mark of last year.

COTTON.—The sales of the week summed up barely 13,000 bales, at irregular prices, but mostly at a decline of ¼ to ½c. in the Middling grades. On Wednesday the further sales at this decline were about 4000 bales, with European advices five days later on hand by the Circassian, confirming the decline of 1-16 to ⅛d. at Liverpool, reported by the City of Washington. On Thursday additional dispatches were before the public, embracing more full and less encouraging political advices, but no marked effect was observable here, some buyers coming forward and taking about 5,500 bales. Yesterday there were further sales to the extent of about 5,000 bales; making a total for the past three days of 14,500 bales, and for the week of 27,500 bales; the receipts, during same period, 13,099; and the exports, 65,744; Stock, in Presses and on shipboard, not cleared on 29th inst. 210,313 bales. With respect to prices, we have to remark that a good deal of irregularity has prevailed, there does not appear to have been any further marked decline since that noticed in the early part of the week, as factors generally are not pressing their stocks, and some have declined the current rates.

The receipts at this port since the 1st September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 1,614,038 bales, against 1,453,541 bales to same date last year; and the increase in the receipts at all ports, up to the latest dates as compared with last year is 745,025 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 270,880 bales to Great Britain, of 44,739 to France, and of 207,937 bales to other foreign ports.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

Centenary College of Louisiana.

TO THE PUBLIC.—The undersigned, a quorum of the Executive Committee of Centenary College of Louisiana, would state that the Rev. VERNON H. JOHNSON, a member of the Mississippi Conference, is our agent for the College—to raise funds for building and endowment purposes—and that we cordially commend him, and the cause he represents, to the friends of Education and the public generally.

The Board of Trustees, have recently erected a large building, for College purposes, at a cost of 60,000; upon which a heavy balance remains unpaid. They wish to pay this debt, and to raise the endowment fund to at least $100,000. They know that the friends of education are able to do this, and they believe they are willing, and only wait the opportunity. Under these considerations, our Agent has gone forth; and, from his present success, we feel confident that the work will be done speedily. Friends desiring to know our plan or to co-operate with us, can communicate with the Agent, Rev. V. N. JOHNSON, Cayuga Mississippi; or with JOHN C. MILLER, Jackson, La.

Jackson, La., April 1st, 1859. JOHN C. MILLER, J. H. MUSE, B. J. BOWMAN, JOHN MCVEA.

THE VICKSBURG DEPOSITORY.

MR. EDITOR.—As it may not be improper, with your permission I will pen a few thoughts for the public eye, in reference to this Depository and a few side issues.

And to begin, I will say, that we have about the best stock of books in the South, selected from the Publishing House at Nashville, and from publishers North and East, a great variety. And if there was the unanimity in the Mississippi Conference for the Depository and its work, that there seems to be in some other Conferences, we might do a vast amount of good, by the blessing of God upon our labors. Yet we are at work, and doing something. But some one (or more if they be) is busily putting into circulation reports that are unfounded, untrue, and injurious.

One is, that we are going to fail; another, that we are bound to fail; another, that we have failed; another, that no orders can be or will be filled; another, that we do not pay annuities; another, that we will not send books unless the money accompanies the order; another, that more than one-half of those who subscribed, or gave their notes for stock, have repudiated and will not pay, and that the rest are afraid to pay; and so we are about to make a great fauxpas of the whole affair, and disgrace ourselves, the Conference, and the Church—and much more of about the same stripe.

To ease some of their apprehensions; to gratify the desire which others may have to know; to relieve others who are anxious about our success; to correct false rumor, and set ourselves right before the people among whom these reports have been circulated; to encourage our friends, and to outlist all the preachers, I submit the following statement.

Under such circumstances as have presented upon us, we have done better than the friends of the enterprise have believed we could, in sales, etc.

We have collected $15,875 on our stock, have about $7,200 in notes and subscriptions regarded as reliable, and about $3000 set down as doubtful—not more than one-half or one-third of which may be realized; making about $23,075, stock realized, in money, and notes believed to be good; and a doubtful list of $3000. This should encourage the friends of the Depository to pay up their notes soon, at once, if they can. We hope they will.

Orders are filled with promptness and dispatch; so far as we have the books when they come. But we cannot insure that any book will be in this Depository which may be ordered by a Brother, as the orders which may arrive in one day would require every such book, if not more. Yet we are exerting ourselves to keep on hand a large and well assorted stock of books; which ranges from $10,000 to $15,000 in value. We are receiving books almost every week from the publishers at Nashville, New York, etc. We think that many would do well to send to us for books—better, if they would do their best to sell them, and get their people to read them. "My people are destroyed for the lack of knowledge," said God, by the mouth of the prophet. "Give attendance to reading," said an apostle.

None have failed to receive "annuities" who are entitled to them, except three brethren who wrote for such books as we did not have; we did not feel obliged to go out and buy books for that purpose.

The design of offering annuities was, to make so many agents of the shareholders, to put into circulation religious books and tracts: that they and their families might read them, and circulate them in their immediate neighborhoods. But somehow or other, some of them never seem to think of this when they order their annuities.

The object of the Society and Depository is, to do good by circulating religious books and tracts. These the shareholders are entitled to, as annuities; and with a little additional outlay of money, any one might obtain a supply of very good books, in a few years—a library of standard works. One year, he might take Clarke's, or Benson's, or Henry's commentaries, and pay the difference in the price. The next, he might take Watson's Dictionary and Institutes, and some tracts. One year, he might select books suitable for his children.

The annuities were designed, again, to give us so many active interested agents, who would be scattered over a large territory of country, enlisted for the success of the enterprise. What an amount of good they might do, if they would thus exert themselves! How much information on religious subjects they might bring into their families and neighborhoods!

H. H. MONTGOMERY.

IMPORTANT.

To every Preacher in Charge, in the M. E. Church, South:

MY DEAR BROTHERS:—I earnestly beg your immediate attention to a few points relating to our Sunday school work. The Discipline, (pp. 114—110,) makes it your duty—

1. To see that a Sunday-school be formed in every congregation under your care where ten children can be collected for that purpose.

2. To preach on the subject of Sunday-schools and religious instruction in each congregation, at least once in six months.

3. To lay before the Quarterly Conference, at each quarterly meeting, to be entered on its Journal, a written statement of the number and state of the Sunday-schools within your circuit or station, and to make a report of the same to your Annual Conference.

Please be prepared to report at the next session of your Annual Conference the Sunday-school statistics of your charge, under the following items, and in this order:

1. The number of schools.
2. The number of officers and teachers.
3. The number of volumes in their libraries.
4. The number of Sunday-school Visitors taken.
5. Amount of money raised for Sunday-school purposes.
6. Amount of money raised by Sunday-schools for benevolent purposes, i. e., to aid other schools, for missions, etc.
7. The number of conversions of Sunday-school scholars during the year.

The General Conference has requested you to take up a collection in all your congregations, once a year, in aid of the funds of the Parent Sunday-school Society. Will you please do this as early as practicable, and send the money to Dr. J. B. McFerrin, Nashville, Tennessee. He is the Treasurer of the Sunday-school Society of the M. E. Church, South.

If you can form a new Sunday-school in any place where the people are too poor to pay for a library, send on to Dr. McFerrin the name and place to which it should be directed, and one will be sent gratuitously. Of course, our ability to do this will depend on the amounts received from other quarters.

Encourage every school within your charge to subscribe for the Sunday-school Visitor.

Six dollars will procure 30 copies to one address.

Ten dollars will procure 50 copies.

Twenty dollars will procure 100 copies.

This will cost the subscribers but twenty cents each, if they pay individually to make up the amount.

I shall be glad to hear from you at any time about your Sunday-schools. Write to me interesting or important facts, incidents, narratives of child-history, of conversions, of happy deaths, etc.; any thing bearing upon this great and blessed cause. Yours affectionately, CHARLES TAYLOR,

Cor. Secretary, S. S. Society M. E. Church, South.

☞ My Post-office is Columbia, S. C.

To the Shareholders of the Book and Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference.

We have received TWENTY FIVE copies of the "Genealogical Bible," of the Depository at Vicksburg; THIRTEEN more are on the way, and we are informed that the remainder will be forwarded to us in June.

You will, then, please inform me of the route and to whose care we must send yours. And if yours does not come out of the first lot, just be patient a little while.

A mahogany case has also been sent to us, which those who wish can get by sending $10. So we have been instructed. The case is neat, attractive, and substantial, lined on the bottom of the inside with silk velvet. H. H. MONTGOMERY, Agent.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE LA. CONFERENCE.

BRETHREN: We have in the village of Washington a very good house of worship, but there is a debt of about $1000, with interest for several years, hanging over it. We have only about ten members of the Church—mostly females, and very poor. Some person or persons are trying to purchase it for a theatre-ball-room, etc.; but the generous creditor proposes, for $1000, to relinquish his entire claim thereon. It is in a real hot-bed of Romanism and wickedness. Shall we allow our Church in Washington to become a theatre, and thus see our prospects of saving that people extinguished? I propose that we answer, NO! by raising in the bounds of our respective works, each, from ten to twenty dollars, to be paid in liquidating this debt. I believe, if we can retain the Church, we can build up Methodism there.

Should this fall under the eye of any person friendly to the cause of God, let that person send me any amount to be appropriated to the same end. Address BENJ. F. WHITE,

JOINT BOARD CENTENARY COLLEGE.—CALLED MEETING.

I am instructed to give the Joint Board of Centenary College notice that a Called Meeting will take place on the 18th (WEDNESDAY) of May. The business to be attended to imperatively demands attention. However urgent other duties may be, we ought to give attention to this. W. H. WATKINS, Sec.

To the Members of Mississippi Conference.

Our "MINUTES" are READY FOR DISTRIBUTION, and will be sent to all who have contributed for their publication, as fast as they can be forwarded. We make a pro rata distribution. Do any of the preachers want them, who have contributed nothing? You can now supply yourselves; the stock is not exhausted, and they are not quite all paid for. Every intelligent layman, throughout our Conference, needs them. You want to see what part you are expected to take in Conference business, if sent up to Conference from your Quarterly meetings; you want to know what laymen are expected to do, whether you are called to do it or not. Send and get your "MINUTES;" they contain what you can get nowhere else. Yours in Christian bonds.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

The Little Ones.

A row of little faces by the bed,
A row of little hands upon the spread,
A row of little eyelids eyed all closed,
A row of little naked feet exposed.

A gentle mother leads them in their praise,
Teaching their feet to tread in heavenly ways,
And takes this lull in childhood's busy tide,
The little errors of the day to chide.

No lovelier sight this side of heaven is seen,
And angels hover o'er the group serene;
Instead of elfin in a corner crying,
There floats the fragrance of an infant's tongue.

Then, nestling bedlings into waiting beds,
Beneath the sheets they hide their timid heads,
And slumber steals away their life fears,
And like a peeping bud each face appears.

All dressed like angels in their gowns of white,
They're wafted to the skies in dreams of night;
And heaven will sparkle in their eyes at morn,
And stolen graces all their ways adorn.

President Longstreet's Address.

Judge A. B. Longstreet, who was for some years president of Emory College, Georgia, afterwards of the University of Mississippi, at Oxford, and now of South Carolina College at Columbia, closes his baccalaureate address to the recent graduating class of the last named institution, with the following eloquent passage:

"You are embarking upon a strange world my young friends. It banished Aristides, poisoned Socrates, murdered Cicero, and crucified the Lord of Glory. The spirit of Themistocles, of Mecenas, of Anthony and Cæsarism is still in the world—greatly subdued and low-bound, to be sure, but not extinguished. You may expect, therefore, at times to be depressed by your rivals, condemned for your virtues, persecuted for your patriotism, and tormented for your benefactions; to have your conduct abused, your motives misconstrued, your integrity derided, and to suffer a thousand impositions, in matters—from those from whom you had a right to expect better things. These are hard things to bear, my you. They are so, my young friends, and you never will bear them as you should, unless you take the good book for your guide, and look daily to its author for supplies of strength sufficient for your trial. Do this and all will be well at last. With that chart in your hand, now launch your bark upon the troubled ocean of life; and when the squalls strike you, be at least as prudent and as firm as the common sailor; haul in your main-sail, reef your top-sails, and be found hard at the helm, with your chart before you and your eye fixed on Bethlehem's star.

When they pass away, take your reckoning, and see where you are. If you have lost headway, right ship, crowd sail to your course again cheerily. Towards the close of the voyage, you will find that the cranks which start ahead of you at the beginning of it, but veered about with every pleasant breeze, are all in turned, threatened or far in your rear, firing signal guns of distress, while you move gallantly into port. There you will cast anchor and enter a city of inconceivable splendour—the new Jerusalem—its buildings of pure gold, its walls of jasper and its gates of pearl. There you will be welcomed, without question, to a Great College of a hundred and forty thousand, and thousands of thousands of all nations, kindred, people and tongues, under a Teacher absolutely perfect; and, of course, altogether lovely. In all that vast brotherhood, no unkind feeling is ever spoken, no sigh is ever breathed, no tear is ever shed, and there the sad word with which I close my counsels is never heard—farewell. May heaven's richest blessing attend you through life, and heaven's rewards await you at its close.—Again farewell."

The Little Swiss Girl.

In Swiss family there was a little girl not quite eight years old. Every Sunday, at breakfast, the parents give to each child a small loaf of the finest and best sort of bread to eat. She always enjoyed her loaf as the rest. But she heard at the Sunday-school that, by bringing to her teacher every Sunday a few pieces of money, each child might, at the end of a few weeks, obtain a little of her own—quite her own, and to keep for herself. At once she made up her mind to ask her parents not to give her the best loaf at breakfast, but to allow her to eat the common bread, and give the difference between the prices of the two loaves to her. To this her parents agreed, though not without expressing surprise; and the little girl, during nearly four months, went without the best bread in order to obtain a Bible of her own.

Many of the little Swiss children not only desire to have the Bible, but they love its truths. A little tract, written and printed for the young was distributed among them last Christmas. Beneath the title a space was left in which to insert the name of the child, and over this there was printed these words, "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee." No sooner had one of the little ones received her copy, and read the words, than she ran to her teacher, and cried: "O, Miss, look, look! it is for me—yes, it is for me that the words have been placed here—'The Lord bless thee!' I shall be blessed! O, blessed! What a happiness!" It was a word of the blessed volume, which at that moment fell on the heart of the little Swiss child as a drop of dew from heaven. [Sunday School Gazette.]

A Touching Incident.

While an aged and poorly clad female was asking alms at the corner of Fourth and Chestnut streets, Philadelphia, a short looking sailor passed within a few feet of her, gazing intently on her haggard face for several minutes. She appreciated him, and extended her palm in silence.

Instantly his hand found its way to his capacious pocket, and when he drew it out it was filled with gold and silver, which he forced her to accept saying, "There, good mother, take this; you may as well have it as the landsharks. The last cruise I had out of New York found me with four thousand dollars on hand; but as the neighbors told me my mother was dead, I got on a spree with the money, and spent it all inside of a week, and then shipped again." Oh! good, good sir! you are too kind to an old body like me. For your sake I will take it. Oh! you remind me of my poor son, George White! where are you now?"

"George White!" he audibly exclaimed—the new excited sailor. "Why, that's my name! and you—you are my mother!"

With this he seized her in his arms and kissed her affectionately, while the big tears of joy ran down his bronzed cheek.

The poor woman was entirely overcome by the recovery of her long lost child.

A carriage shortly after conveyed the mother and son away, leaving many a moistened eye among the crowd who witnessed the scene.

"Good to Make Men Of."

A gentleman once asked a company of little boys what they were good for. One little fellow promptly replied,

"We are good to make men of."

Think of that, young friends; you are all good to make men and women of. We do not mean—nor did that little boy—that you are merely to grow up to the size of men and women. No, no! mean a good deal more than this. You are good to make persons that will be respected and useful; that will help to do good in the world. No one, who is not useful, and who does not seek to make the world better, deserves the name of man or woman.

You should not forget that, if there are to be any men and women—say, that deserve such a name—twenty or thirty years hence, they are to be made of you, who are now children. What a world this will be when you grow up, if all of you only make men and women! Will you not ponder this subject, and show yourselves men?

The Society of the Cincinnati.

The Cincinnati are a society established by the officers of the revolutionary army of the United States, in 1783, to perpetuate their friendship, and to raise a fund for relieving the widows and orphans of those who had fallen during the war. The name of Cincinnatus was adopted as emblematic of the civic character of the American army. The honors of the society were to be hereditary in the eldest male issue of the collateral male line. This resolution excited the fears of the republicans of America, and among them, of Franklin. They thought they saw in it the germ of a future aristocracy. At the first general meeting of the order in Philadelphia, some modifications were therefore made in the constitution, and in some of the States it was entirely abandoned. At present there are many State Societies, which hold a general meeting by delegates triennially.

Signature of Milton in his Blindness.

Can a man in mid-age write, when stone-blind, his name distinctly? "That is the question," says the Illustrated London News, "which has been argued lately respecting the signature of Milton to the conveyance of a bond for a sum of money to the Optick Shiner, made immortal by the noble sonnet which Milton addressed to him on his blindness. The date of the document is the 7th of May, 1663—the Restoration month and year; the signature is John Milton, firm and upright, and the impression on the wax seal is the spread eagle of the Miltons. Of the genuineness of the document there can be no doubt whatever. But did Milton, then blind, write this signature, unaided, or did he write it while his hand was held? We are in favor of the former view, and so was Mr. Moncton Milnes, who carried off the precious document—suggestive of so many thoughts—at the comparatively cheap price of nineteen guineas."

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

A "TOUCH OF NATURE."

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever"—whether found in high life or low, in connection with joy or sorrow—at bridal or burial. Last summer we published the following incident in the editorial columns of the New Orleans Christian Advocate:

"LET ME KISS HIM, FOR HIS MOTHER."

"The history of the New Orleans epidemic of 1858, like every other one perhaps, abounds in incidents, could they all be versified and written, sufficient to make a volume of most thrillingly romantic reality.

"One was recently related to us by one of our city pastors. He was called, a few days since, to attend the funeral of a young man. Before his sickness, he was a stout, buoyant, manly youth. He was from the State of Maine, and had been here but a short time. He was attacked with yellow fever, and soon died; with no mother or relative to watch by his bed-side, or to soothe him with that sympathy which none but those of our own 'dear kindred blood' can feel or manifest. He died among strangers, and was buried by them.

"When the funeral service was over, and the strange friends who had ministered to him were about to finally close the coffin, an old lady who stood by stopped them, and said, "Let me kiss him, for his mother!" O, what a women's heart was there! Her own motherly heart taught her

'To feel another's woe.'

"We have yet to find the first man or woman to whose eyes this simple recital has not brought tears. That dear old lady, whoever she is, is probably wholly unconscious of having uttered a sentiment and performed an action, unsurpassed in beautiful simplicity and sublime eloquence. May her sons, when they die, not lack a mother's sympathy; but, if they should, may they find one who will kiss them for their mother!

"'One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.'"

In our whole editorial life, we have not known anything of the kind to be more extensively copied. It went the rounds of the press, like the first smile of the morning sun over the earth. A Washington city correspondent recently said, that it had inspired the muse of four different poets. Had he said forty, he would have come nearer the mark. We have seen three or four effusions of the kind in one of the best papers in the country, and in many others it has been celebrated in melodious verse. Several have been sent us. We publish one below.

"Let me kiss him, for his mother,"
For his mother far away,
Ere his form so fair and manly,
In the silent grave you lay;
She will bless me, bless me often,
For the kiss I give to-day!

Look upon those cold, pale features—
Beauty clings about them now,
But through all his prattling childhood,
How she loved o'er them to bow—
Proud of every new charm coming,
To his lip, or cheek, or brow.

When at length he came to youth-hood,
What a prophet was her heart;
Shaping in the early future,
For her boy a noble part—
Fighting, in life's weary battle,
Like a hero from the start.

And he went out from the sunlight
Of his peaceful, happy home,
Like a young and valiant soldier,
Through the mighty world to roam,
With a cheerful, hopeful bosom,
Passing o'er the billow's foam.

In his dreams, he wore the laurels,
Only for the worthy twined;
For the beings who have struggled
Passionately for mankind,
Guided on their upward pathway
By a pure and earnest mind.

It may be that he had errors,
That he sometimes went astray,
Yet I ne'er saw perfect creature,
And my locks are thin and grey—
And I know, where'er he wandered,
There was one for him to pray.

One to sit beside the hearth-stone,
When the leaf was red and sere,
When the Winter winds went wailing—
Wailing fitfully and drear,
Wishing, while her tears are streaming,
"Would my erring boy were here."

Once I had a child—his image
Death and time cannot destroy,
And 't would soothe this aching bosom—
Even give a touch of joy,
If I knew, when life had left him,
That a mother kissed my boy!

"Let me kiss him, for his mother,"
For his mother far away,
Ere his form, so fair and manly,
In the silent grave you lay,
"Let me kiss him, for his mother,"
Mine shall be HER kiss to-day. N. Y. E.

LETTER FROM A LOG CABIN.

Bayou Bartholomaw Ashley, co., Ark., March 31, 1859.

'Tis a most lovely morning, the sun is just rising, shedding forth light and beauty. We all rejoice to see the beautiful light.

"Where is thy dwelling-place, all-pleasing Light?
Around Jehovah's everlasting throne,
Where inaccessible, He sits alone,
'Mid joy supreme, ineffable delight.
Thy radiant face makes all wide nature glad;
Hill, valley, rock and river, thou dost cheer;
And little birds make melody, if thou appear—
Deprived of thy fond presence, they are sad."

This charming morning cheers my heart. I love to pause, and listen to the gentle, pleasant voices of nature; they raise my soul upward, and create a longing to be more nearly assimilated to Our Father in Heaven, in parity, holiness and charity.

The mild zephyrs of the lovely spring-season are opening the buds and flowers. All nature rejoices in the goodness of God: the beautiful flowers, the birds, the forests all praise Him. The sin-darkened heart alone is silent. How sad the thought that man, endowed with reason and immortality, with a heart and mind to admire the beauties of creation, alone is tardy in loving and adoring the beneficent Maker, who extends His loving kindness over all.

"Bless God, for trees! Did he not deign
Aught other witness of His name,
The yearly miracle that clothes
Their naked limbs each spring with robes,
And keeps them fresh through summer heat,
The Atheist's cavil all could meet."

How lovely the beautiful season of spring, in the country—

"The lilac's sweet perfume
Scents all the air;
Buds and flowers are springing
Everywhere.
Soft air, like summer's breath,
Comes wandering by;
To you deep blue looks up
The violet's eye.
Emerald robes now wear
The forests old—
Crocus bedeck our bowers,
Like stars of gold;
The 'lily of the vale'
Looks meekly up,
Kisses the light, then hides
Her waxen cup."

The gentle evening, with its "twilight hour," is quietly approaching, bringing with it memories of my childhood's happy home, and of the dear friends who once gathered around its cheerful hearth-stone.

"Soft as rays of sunlight stealing
On the dying day;
Sweet as chimes of low bells pealing
When eve fades away;
Sad as winds at night, that moan
Through the heath, o'er mountain lone,
Come the thoughts of days now gone."

The dogwoods and their white flowers, the fragrant breeze rustling amid the new leaves, the mellow, cheery notes of the many birds flitting hither and thither, in their busy building of airy nests, carries memory back to my prairie home in the sunny land of Louisiana, and to the green little grave upon which the beautiful dogwoods are now showering their white blossoms.

"This breath of flowers, this song of summer bird,
This balmy breeze upon the aching brow,
Comes on the soul like some remembered word
That wakes the past and makes the pale cheeks glow
With feelings that dwell not in the bosom now!
The Past, the Past! Life has no annual spring
To bud our perished flowers, and make them grow;
No hand to bind the harp's long broken string,
Or plume for loftier flight, the fading, drooping wing."

LOW-NECKED DRESSES.

In the early days of Pennsylvania there was a law which stated as follows—"That if any white female, of ten years or upward, should appear in any public street, lane, highway, church, court-house, tavern, ball-room, theatre, or any other place of public resort, with naked shoulders, (i.e. low-necked dresses) being able to purchase necessary clothing, shall forfeit and pay a fine, not less than one nor more than two hundred dollars." The closing paragraph of the law, however, permitted women of questionable character to bare their shoulders, as a badge of distinction between the chaste and the unchaste.

A SWEET REVIVAL HYMN.

Air: "The Old Arm Chair."

I once was a stranger to grace and to God;
I knew not my danger, I felt not my load:
When friends spoke in rapture of Christ on the tree,
This JESUS, this JESUS, was nothing to me!

I oft read with pleasure, to soothe or engage,
ISAIAH's wild measure, or JOHN's simple page;
But still when they pictured the blood-sprinkled tree,
This JESUS, this JESUS, was nothing to me!

Like tears from the daughters of Zion, that roll,
I wept when the waters went over his soul—
Yet I knew not my sins had him nailed to the tree,
Still JESUS, still JESUS, was nothing to me!

But free grace awoke, me by light from on high!
Then many fears shook me! I trembled to die!
No refuge, no hope in myself could I see—
I saw that this JESUS, my Savior must be.

My terrors all vanished before the sweet name;
My guilty fears banished, with boldness I came
To drink at His fountain, life-giving and free;
And JESUS, this JESUS was all things to me!

Dear JESUS! thou shalt be my treasure and boast:
While leaning upon thee I ne'er can be lost.
In thee will I conquer, by flood and by field—
My Cable, my Anchor, my Rock and my Shield!

And in the dark valley and shadow of death,
This watch-word shall rally my faltering breath;
And when from life's fever my God shall set free,
This JESUS, sweet JESUS, my death-song shall be!

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

JOHN H. ODOM died at his residence, near Suggsville, Clarke county, Alabama, on the 12th April, 1859, after an illness of thirteen days. He was boro in Chester District, South Caroline, June 15, 1834. Has resided in this vicinity eight years. Was married on 3d February, 1857, to Mrs. F., relict of the late Richard H. Puryear. He leaves her with three children—one his, and two step-children—to mourn their irreparable loss. He professed religion, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, during a camp-meeting at Suggsville, in 1853; and was a faithful and devoted member till his death. Modest, and shrinking from a prominent position in the church, he was nevertheless a constant and prompt attendant at the house of God, ever ready to do his duty and assist, by his prayers and exhortations, at revival meetings. During his last illness, he inquired with much interest about the class in the Sunday-school, of which he was the teacher. A strict son of temperance, a trustee of the schools in this place, he took a deep interest in the cause of education, and in everything calculated to promote the welfare of mankind. He was loved by all for his even and affectionate disposition, his benevolence, and great worth as a citizen, friend, and Christian gentleman. The youngest child of his parents, he was the first one who professed religion and joined the Church—and he is the first of the children called to die. Perhaps, greatly through the influence of his prayers and example, his mother and several of the family have been induced to join the Church; and, even those not in the Church, promised him on his death bed to meet him in heaven. During his sickness he expressed a desire to live, on account of his wife and family; but said, that he was not afraid to die, that God's grace sustained him. He said he was happy, and had much peace. May God bless and sustain his wife, to whom this world has indeed been a vale of tears—she having lost her parents, brothers and sisters, and two husbands; and, just before the death of her last husband, her second child, a bright little boy of seven summers. Suggsville, Ala., April 25, 1859.

MR. THO'S WOODSIDES, aged fifty-eight, died in East Feliciana, Louisiana. He was boro in South Carolina of Irish parents, who had but recently emigrated to this country; about 1820 he left for tho then new State of Mississippi, and settled in Wilkinson county, near Woodville. Somewhat late in life, he was married to Miss Emily Land, of the same county, a young lady of great amiability of temper and native goodness. In 1853 he moved to this State, and settled, in the Black Creek neighborhood, Parish of East Feliciana. In all relations of life he was a model man, persevering and indefatigable in business, carrying out the Scriptural injunction "whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." Quiet and unobtrusive in his manners, avoiding as much as possible the gaze of the world, he occupied an enviable position in society. So far as I know, Mr. Woodsides had made no open profession of religion; that he was, however, a man of faith, I fully believe. He was ready at all times to assist those who were more actively engaged in carrying out the great scheme of redemption; and up to the day of his death he was one of the most steady and certain supporters of the Methodist Church in his neighborhood. A devoted and most affectionate wife, and four lovely children will long mourn the best of husbands and the most indulgent of parents, though their sorrow is not without hope.

Dearest husband thou hast left me
And thy loss we deeply feel,—
Yet 'twas God's own hand bereft me,—
He can all my sorrows heal.

CATHARINE RENTON died, in her 26th year, near Winnsboro, Franklin parish, La., on the 27th of February, 1859. She was boro in Mississippi, December 17th 1833; she joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1848, and lived a consistent member till death. She was most beloved by those who knew her best. Confined to her bed about two months, she and her husband often conversed about her departure. She always told him that she was reconciled to the will of God. The writer visited, sang, and prayed with her, and found her calm and reconciled. The day she died, she exhorted all her friends to prepare, for death, and to meet her in heaven. She remarked that she "was going to Jesus." She called her husband to her side, and told him to meet her in heaven; then turned to her two eldest children and told them to be good children and meet hor again.

THOS. H. McCLENDON.

EDMUND T. RENTON died et his residence in Winnsboro, Franklin parish, La., 10th March, 1859. He was born in what is now Franklin perish, 10th of April 1828. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1848, and lived a consistent member until death. He always appeared to live, "as seeing him who is invisible." He kept his lamp trimmed and burning, waiting for the call divine. Often have I seen him in the church when it appeared his cup was full. He was speechless for about twenty-four hours before he died; but often previous to this, he expressed himself as being ready to die, if it was his Heavenly Father's will. He leaves a wife and three children to mourn his loss. THOS. H. McCLENDON

MISS HENRIETTA LAWRENCE, daughter of Andrew Lawrence, Esq., of Bossier, La., died of consumption, April 9, 1859, after a prolonged illness, aged 16 years. She passed away as one falls asleep, triumphant over death. She had no fears. On being asked, by a friend, if she was willing to go? she replied with a smile, "yes, I want to go." She requested her friends to sing "I would not live always," and with a feeble voice she joined them. A few moments before her death, her father approached her: "my daughter," said he, "there are many friends whom you will meet in heaven." O! yes," she replied, "and Jesus will be there; that is best of all! Thus she passed away. PEAR.

Bossier parish La.

NANCY VARNER was born June 22d, 1833; she married John Kennedy January 9, 1851; she joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at twelve years of age. She died in Sabine parish, La., the thirteenth of March, 1859. Her life was a beautiful illustration of the Christian virtues. Her death was a bright attestation of its truth. Her last hours on earth, were spent with the Savior. A few minutes before she died—she sang—"there is a better day coming"—afterward—"O, come, and let us go where pleasure never ends." When asked if she wanted anything—"Nothing, I am engaged with my Savior." Thus she died. We sympathize with her grief-stricken husband and orphan babes. Jesus will console. S.

Pleasant Hill, April 4, 1859.

MRS. JULIA ANN DANIEL, died 26th March, 1859, aged about thirty-three years, at the residence of R. C. Daniel, Bedford county, Tennessee. She was married to T. K. Daniel in 1844, and resided in Claiborne county, Mississippi; her husband died 1851, leaving three sons, one of which, shortly after died. She had been a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, about fifteen years. During the year 1858, she became much afflicted; went to Tennessee where she died of consumption—willingly, resigned to her fate. Her last words were. "I am willing to die." Calling her two little sons to her bed side, she bade them farewell. S. K. DANIEL.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Mess. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your concession to insert the communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against the terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a teething infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

W. H. VASSER.

UNITARIANS ON METHODISM.

The Christian Examiner for March, contains a generous and elegantly written article on Dr. Steven's History of Methodism. Its views on Methodism may not be wholly endorsed by Methodists, but will be read with interest. It says:

"This History of Methodism, so far as the present volume carries it, might almost equally well be called The Book of Martyrs." We are moved to exclaim, as we read, "Behold the patience and faith of the Saints!" We are tempted to marvel, at first, how it could be that these godly men, oven with the irregular manner and the rongest matter of their gospel preaching, should draw upon themselves, wherever they went, such a persistent, relless storm of persecution. The account of a mob's lampling upon a meek preacher of salvation, "to stamp the Holy Ghost out of him," seems almost incredible. ur incredolity, to be sure, is considerably abated when we see a respectable Edinghurgh reviewer, who by his position and profession should have been refined and religious, could in the beginning of this nineteenth century ink of these "didactic artizans," "delirious mechanics," "nest of consecrated cobblers," "the nasty and nurerous vermin of Methodism." When we read such expressions, and remember that "he who huteth his brother is a murderer," we are prepared to conceive that the recom of Pharisaism and Sadducism combined, the naticism of daintiness and the fanaticism of ignorance ining hands, might well have vented itself upon the ads of men whose great offence was gospel honesty, d even in such heart-sickening atrocities as occur so ten in the first decades of Methodism.

It will be said, indeed, that these severities of the critic his closet and the crowd on the common were provoked by the extravagances, if not of the preacher, yet the hearers and receivers of the new doctrine. These may serve, to be sure, in some degree to explain the general excitement of the unsympathizing, out of which their excesses of madness against the Methodists grew. Perhaps, however, for practical purposes, the shortest explanation of the fury which this people drew upon itself as good as any, namely, the indwelling of Satan in his children.

Methodism has had a grand mission to fulfill in modern Christendom; a mission of mediation, we might say between the differing sects on the one hand, and between exclusive church and a neglected world on the other. And there is a moral majesty in the firm and sure tread with which it has marched to the accomplishment of its work.

In dogmatics, Methodism has always been a standing protest, or rather persuasive, against bigotry. We can willingly believe that the repugnance which the wiser father of Methodism felt for theological controversy arose mainly from this twofold apprehension; first, that it would distract and deaden the practical zeal and efficiency of the converts, and secondly, that it might engender bitterness and pride. To quote Mr. Withington's application of the text, he feared that a viper might come out of the heat. It is our opinion and experience, that of all Christian sects the Methodists are those with whom, in their theological positions, the so-called Liberal Christians can most easily sympathize. Our chief practical difference in this respect would probably be, that controversy, which they dread as poison, we regard as the angel that stirs the pool of our Protestant faith, and keeps it from stagnating. Wesley carried his dread of controversy to such an extreme, that on one occasion he laments that he had to "spend near ten minutes in controversy with some Baptists—more than he had done for many months, perhaps years, before." For our own part, we do not believe that in the age which is coming, and which now is, it is going to be quite practicable for Christian men to agree to use the same, even though they are scriptural words and phrases, when we understand them so differently as we do, without telling each other plainly, and asking ourselves distinctly, what we mean by them. We may call what this must lead to, conference or controversy, at any rate it is reasoning together, and in some form or other is an important help toward the attainment of the truth which sanctifies the soul.

But we honor and admire Wesley's degree of neutrality so far as it arose from his making the practical doctrines of religion and scripture the essential ones, and the practical character of the dogma the grand test of its importance. Bravely has Methodism contended against the predominance of the merely speculative tendency in the Christian character and Church. And when we think of Wesley's position, between Calvinism on the one hand and Pelagianism on the other, we do not remember a better illustration than he and his disciples afford of the pithy saying of "Lacon," that "we should act with as much earnestness as those who expect everything from themselves, and pray with as much earnestness as those who expect everything from God."

The peculiar power of Methodism lies in the practical, wise, humane tendency of its efforts. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is its leading motto—and we believe it can well abide this test. No church, except the Roman Chatholic, can compare with the Methodist in the active determination to do away with the reproof that "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." No church has done so much (notwithstanding what has been or may be said about the despotic power of its hierarchy) to defend the doctrine of the equal sanctity of sincere ministers of God, whether formally ordained or not; a favorite saying among the Methodists is, that "it takes the whole Church to preach the gospel" (certainly, then to perform it).

Perhaps in no one quality did the founder of Methodism more nearly resemble his great Master, than in that true wisdom which is born, not of fear nor of time serving selfishness, but of God-serving love for the soul of man. That "wisdom from above" was conspicuous in every word and step of this holy man. It inspired that opulent fact by which he felt his way along, desiring barely to follow providence as it gradually opened. It manifests itself in his pithy comments upon incident and character—in the very neatness and nicety of his style of expression—in the apt use of scriptural texts. It was strikingly exhibited in the way (ingenious without ceasing to be ingenuous) in which he steered clear of the dangers that lay in the quietism of the Moravians, the Calvinism of Whitefield, and the ecclesiasticism of Charles Wesley; and in the eclectic spirit that got what was good from each, the quietness from quietism, the sentiment of the sovereignty of Divine grace from Calvinism, and from ecclesiasticism, that reverence for "heaven's first law" that made him for years cling to the hope of reforming the English Church without going out of it, and indeed, to the day of his death unwilling to do more than provide against the future contingency, "that Methodism would be compelled, sooner or later, to take an independent and permanent form."

We are not sure that Methodism can be as successfully defended against the charge of a tendency (or liability) to bigotry in matters of Christian discipline, as in those of doctrine. Nobly, indeed pre-eminently, have the Methodists held forth and carried out the precept, "whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all for the glory of God." Strenuously have they contended for the infusion of religion all through the daily life—but whether they have not been in danger of making the maxim read "life for religion," instead of "religion for life;" whether they have not too often adopted too narrow and formal, and precise an idea of what religion is, and judged other men's character and conduct with an unwise severity, is a question we are not prepared to answer in the negative.

Of one thing we are confident, that the Methodist movement will be so guided by a good providence, as to be made a mighty help toward the reign of brotherly equality among men, and of that genuine, wholesome universalism in theology, upon which we believe the coming of that heavenly kingdom so much depends."

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

"CHARITY NEVER FAILETH."—St. Paul.

"Pure religion and undefiled" has been regarded by true Christians in all ages as substantially the same thing as charity, or love that never faileth. It is that vital principle of piety that moves the soul to the performance of acts of kindness. In its more practical bearings, it is to love the Lord our God with all the soul, mind and strength, and our neighbor, as ourself. In a word, it is supreme love to God, accompanied by good will toward all men.

If we are not mistaken in our views of the teaching of the Apostle on this subject, all pretensions to piety, and all efforts towards good works, are an entire failure unless they spring from love. Love is the fulfilling of the law of God, in the highest sense of that term. We may possibly be eloquent—yea, "speak with the tongues of men and of angels; if our words do not flow from a loving heart, we are as a "sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." We may be as charitable, in the commonly understood sense of that term, as need be; we may even bestow all our goods to feed the poor, and give our bodies to the flames—and still be profited nothing, unless we are controlled by the power of love.

Yea, all the crosses we bear, the trials we endure, the sacrifices we may make in our Christian pilgrimage, may be cast away with the "rubbish of the temple," unless they are directed by that love that never faileth. We may fast twice every week, we may give tithes of all we possess, and in these respects not be as other men are—and still we may only pay tithes of "mint, anise, and cummin, and neglect the weightier matters of the law—judgment, mercy, and the love of God."

Charity, like an angel of mercy, hovers about the path of the lonely, and whispers words of consolation and encouragement to the hearts of earth's distressed ones, while contending with the bitter ills that flesh is heir to. Love makes the rough paths of life smooth; it makes crooked ways straight, while passing through this vale of tears.

Charity is ever liberal. Love puts the best construction upon all the actions of men; it will not judge harshly or uncharitably. Love speaks no ill of its neighbor; will not think unkindly; does not speak of the faults of others but with the greatest emotion; lest harm should be done, some bad impression made, some wrong conclusion drawn—and thereby injustice be done an unoffending and innocent brother. Love teaches us, each, to esteem the other as better than himself. It will not allow us to speak lightly of each other's gifts, talents, or usefulness. Love cannot question the motives of others, it dare not do it. Love does not, cannot be forward to speak of little indiscretions, and blaze abroad the real or supposed faults of our brethren.

"Charity thinketh no evil." O blessed charity! spread thy heavenly wings over us, that we may "always kindly think and sweetly speak" the sentiments of love! "Behold how good, how pleasant it is, for brethren to dwell together in unity!" It is like precious ointment

If a brother is overtaken in a fault, love teaches the "spiritual to restore such an one in the spirit of meekness;" to put a charitable construction on his words, his actions, and his intentions; and, as far as truth will justify, defend his character. "The same measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again." "With what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged."

Therefore, love teaches, that "whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them." If we would receive kindness, let us be "kindly affectionate, one toward another; with brotherly love, in honor preferring one another." "If there be any comfort in love, think on these things."

Love does not, cannot compromise principle; but while it contends for truth, it still thinks kindly toward those holding different opinions. Love is ever faithful, confiding, and candid; deals plainly but lovingly with every one. Love cannot dwell with the false and treacherous; it will not live in the community of the contentious. It cannot bear the backbiter or the slanderer, but dwells with the innocent and the upright.

"O! Love divine, how sweet thou art!
When shall I find my willing heart
All taken up by thee!"

Finally, brethren, let us "pray for the peace of Jerusalem," and love one another with a pure heart fervently; and above all, put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness. May the love of God keep our hearts and minds pure!

THE DECLINE IN IMMIGRATION.

It is well known, that within the past year or two the foreign immigration to this country has fallen off to one-third its former figure. There has been in the papers a good deal of speculation on the causes and effects of the phenomenon.

It was the fashion in the days when Know-Nothingism flourished, to charge it with having checked immigration. There was no solid ground for the charge. Emigration from Germany and Ireland declined simply because it had been excessive; when those countries were depleted a healthy demand for labor sprang up, which afforded a fair livelihood to the people who had staid at home. Native Americanism had nothing to do with the matter.

We see some papers arguing that the United States are ruined because emigration from Europe has stopped, and no more raw labor is coming to till the West. This is all wrong. The decline of emigration insures its revival by-and-by, just as its excess insured its decline. England, France, Germany, Ireland, and Scotland, are all over-populated; and even if the United States held out to the emigrant no advantages over those countries, there would still be a steady stream of emigrants to our shores, because in Europe population increases faster than employment. Taking Ireland as an example, it is abundantly proven, that so long as the potato yields an average crop, the population will increase far beyond the capacity of the island to support it. It is the same with Germany. The people are prolific, and have not elbow-room at home.

Even independently of this law, it is clear that European emigration to the United States must continue so long as we have fertile, unoccupied lands to offer the immigrant. No country in Europe offers such a future to a young man as do our Western States. Common industry, even without average intelligence, secures a competency for any steady man in the West. We say nothing of political advantages, though with the best class of emigrants these may be presumed to weigh something. But the material superiority of our Western States as a home, over every European country, is so obvious and palpable, that it is unreasonable to expect the Europeans to cease coming here. [Harper's Weekly.]

"FORGIVENESS."

MR. EDITOR.—Under this heading, in the N. O. Christian Advocate of Dec. 15, 1858, I find the following points affirmed;

First, That he who withholds forgiveness, and refuses to bestow it on an offender until he is asked for it, is cherishing the malignant spirit of infernal hatred.

Second, That we ought to bestow forgiveness on an offender, whether he desire it or not.

The Advocate, and document in question, did not reach me until late in February. But believing that you were not afraid to have public attention directed to your position, by setting forth the teaching of the gospel upon the subject, I send this for publication. My object is to be set right if I am wrong, and vice versa.

If your proposition be right, then I have been wrong for sixteen years, and was wrongly taught at the altar of prayer, when mourning on account of my sins. There I was taught to ask, and to ask aright, or I would not receive.

On attentively reading the Bible, I was taught substantially the same thing. The Savior told me to ask, Matt. vii, 7; and then instructed his Apostle, James, to say that the blessing would be withheld until I asked aright.—James, iv. 3.

And the Savior, in his form of prayer, given for our instruction, tells me to ask God to forgive me, as I forgive those who sin against me. But just here, the question comes up—how am I to forgive those who sin against me? on what terms am I to "bestow" this forgiveness?

"If thy brother sin against thee, rebuke him; if he repent, forgive him."—Luke, xvii. 3. This is not only explicit, but to the point. Forgive him, if he repent; clearly implying that if he will not repent, your are to withhold. Hence, when the Savior tells me (and you too) to ask God to forgive me as I forgive others, he tells me (and you too) to forgive others—that is, bestow forgiveness upon them if they repent, and ask.

But, suppose they will not repent—bestow forgiveness upon them, whether they ask it or not?—Christ did not teach me so. Nor can I find where his teaching admits of such a construction. But I do find the contrary, taught in the clearest and most unmistakable language.

But, if the simply withholding forgiveness, or refusing to bestow it until it is asked for, is necessarily cherishing the malignant spirit of infernal hatred—do tell us, how you escape the awful, the horrid conclusion, that God who does not bestow forgiveness until it is asked for, is cherishing this malignant spirit? For nothing is more clearly taught in the book than that He does withhold until it is asked for; and even then, does not bestow it until the sinner asks aright. What is it, then? It is this; God is full of mercy and ready to bestow it; has forgiveness on hand; is full of the spirit of it; but he has ordained, decreed, that man must ask if he would receive. So it should be with man. He should labor and pray for a spirit of forgiveness, be always in possession of the pearl, but hold on to it until it is asked for; and even then, have some evidence that they ask aright; lest when you have bestowed it, "that which is holy," be found to be given to the dogs.—Matt. vii. 6.

The above contains what I have always been taught on this subject, both at the altar of prayer, and from the word of God. And so far from cherishing the malignant spirit of infernal hatred, as you affirm, in my humble judgment, it cherishes the spirit of dignified divinity; a sublime morality; an exalted humility, and magnifies the name of God.

EXAMINE THE SUBJECT AGAIN.

MR. EDITOR: In the Advocate of the 2nd ult., I find an article written over the signature of "Annotator," the caption of which is an incident in the life of Jesus Christ. Like Annotator, Mr. Editor, I believe that there is something truly interesting in every word he spake, and also in every act he performed. I do not think, however, that the same circumstances surrounded the Saviour at the time he used that, memorable language—"The foxes have holes etc.," as were those mentioned by Annotator.

By reference to the eighth chapter of Matthew, it seems to me that we can gather a sufficient history of the circumstances to satisfy our minds that "Annotator's" conclusions are incorrect; or, in other words, A. is mistaken. I will endeavour to relate the circumstances, as (it is very probable to my mind) they occurred.

When Jesus had finished his sermon on the mount and was come down, great multitudes followed him.—Matt. viii. 1st., among whom was a leper, (2nd) whom Jesus healed—3rd.) It will be remembered that Tabor—the mount on which it is supposed that Christ delivered his sermon—is between Jerusalem and Capernaum. He, therefor, in order to get to Capernaum must necessarily travel from Jerusalem. And when he was entered into Capernaum, the centurion met him, etc.—ver. 5th;—and his servant was healed—3rd ver; and when he was come into Peter's house, (it will be remembered that Peter lived in Capernaum) he found his mother-in-law sick of a fever—ver. 14; and he healed her—ver. 15.

The performance of these miracles caused the people, in the afternoon of the same day, to bring unto him many that were possessed with devils, and he cast them out and healed all that were sick—ver. 16. Now when he saw great multitudes about him (what better calculated to attract a crowd, than the performance of such unheard-of miracles) he gave commandment to pass over to the other side—ver. 18th (of lake Genessareth); and just about this time, a certain Scribe, (not disciple, as A. thinks,) but he quotes from Luke—well, Luke says, a certain man (strange way to distinguish a disciple) came and said unto him, Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest—ver. 19th. And Jesus saith unto him, the Foxes have holes, etc.—verse 20th. And when he was entered into the ship (to cross the lake) his disciples followed him—23rd; and a tempest arose while he slept—24th; and the disciples awoke him—25th; and he upbraided them and rebuked the winds—26th; and the men (disciples) marvelled—27th; and when he was come to the other side (of the lake) to the country of the Gergasenes (or Gadarenes) there met him two, possessed with devils, etc.—28th.

Now, sir, I think that this view of the matter makes the circumstances grow out of each other. I would however like to hear from Annotator again.

THE GIRLS OF '78.

The following has been rescued from a newspaper published at the time of the Revolution:—"The following droll affair lately happened at Kinderhook, New York. A young fellow, an enemy to the liberties of America, going to a quilting frolic, where a number young women were collected, and the only man in the company, began his aspersions on Congress, as usual, and held forth some time on the subject, till the girls, exasperated at his impudence, laid hold of him, stripped him to the waist, and instead of tar, covered him with molasses, and for feathers took the downy tops of flags which grow in the meadows, and coated him well, and then let him go. He has prosecuted every one of them, and the matter has been tried before Justice Schoonmaker. It is said Parson Buel's daughter is concerned in the affair."

IS THE USE OF TOBACCO SINFUL?

By RAG-PICKER.

Of late a great deal has been said about the sinfulness of using tobacco; and if we are to believe what its opposers say, all who use it are neither christians nor gentlemen. Some have been courteous in language and charitable in sentiment; but many seem to have discarded both these virtues, and boldly launched out upon a sea of abusiveness. Some have attempted argument, while many have assumed their positions and concluded that tobacco users are unfit both for heaven and the parlor. Even Dr. Clarke loses the usual dignity of his language when writing on this subject.

Now it is questionable if such language does not confirm men in the habit, rather than convince them of its sin. Who, indeed, are the users of tobacco? Are they outcasts from society. No, many of them are among the great and good whom heaven and earth delight to honor. They are worthy citizens, active church members, and ministers. A large number of them are abundant in good works, and are co-labourers with the intellectual and religious. Does the fact then, that they use tobacco warrant the conclusion that they are not christians or gentlemen? Surely a cause that relies upon such weapons as hard names and abuse, in this case at least, must be unfit on bitter or thoughtless feelings.

But on the other hand are the lovers of tobacco free from all blame? They occupy stations in all ranks in the church from the laymen to the Bishop, and if they indulge publicly in this practice and yet believe it is a harmless pleasure, why do they not defend it openly?

They ought not to pass these attacks in silence, for therein they are charged with sin; and being set for lights in the world, they should either show that they do not sin; or give it up at once. They cannot plead, that their consciences do not accuse them, and therefore to them it is no sin; for if what the opposers say be true, their consciences are "seared as with a hot iron." It is necessary then that their reasons for continuing the practice should be known to the world as good and sound, or they must yield to the demands of their opponents.

Now Rag-picker confesses to a fondness for the weed, but he has sometimes been doubtful of its propriety. He fears to yield to them who abuse him and allow him no hope of Heaven; and looking at the examples of his fathers in wisdom and goodness, he feels inclined to smoke on in quietness. But if using tobacco is wrong, he wishes to know it; and be helped by their examples to quit it. If it is a harmless pleasure he desires to smoke his pipe and chew his quid in peace.

CHURCH NUISANCE.

MR. EDITOR: There is a Methodist Church in a small village near me, and where I occasionally worship, which is frequented by tobacco chewers; and these gentlemen, (I am sorry to say some of them are members) indulge in this habit during Divine worship. I have frequently seen very formidable pools of tobacco juice, in sundry places on the gentleman's side; and as a crowded congregation often makes it necessary for ladies to take those seats; they do it at the eminent hazard of ruining their dresses. I presume that it was in consideration of this fact that some thoughtful individual has placed ten or a dozen spit-toons in the house; but these spit-toons, I regret to say, do not meet the demand—as the colored people who occupy the first two or three benches are without spit-toons, and as they use tobacco while in the House of God, they use the floor.

Now I am sure, if these gentlemen reflected for one moment, that this was a desecration of the Sanctuary of the most High God, they would be very far from doing it themselves, or allowing the colored portion of the congregation to do it. I submit these thoughts and facts to you, hoping a word from your nervous pen may accomplish a reformation in this particular. A MEMBER.

CHINIQUI, THE REFORMED PRIEST.

The visit of this remarkable man to Canada has shown that not only is the right of free speech guaranteed among the Queen's Protestant subjects, but that the greater part of the Roman Catholic French population have not the spirit of persecution. The various meetings held at Quebec were most largely attended, and the attempt to drive away Chiniqui failed. He went when he had concluded his engagements there. The Journal of Quebec, from which we some weeks ago quoted an article representing that the Reformed Priest had left under compulsion, it seems was most erroneous, (to say the least,) in its statements and representations.

Even after that journal announced that Father Chiniqui had been forced to flee from the indignation of the French Romanists, the eloquent and fearless man was delivering, according to announcement, his last discourse. He afterwards visited Montreal, and many less important cities and towns of Lower Canada where there was a French population. Not only did good men everywhere rejoice in his expositions of the truth, but the most respectable and influential of the Canadian English press, which has scrupulously abstained from religious discussion, administered the severest rebukes upon the intolerance of the Journal of Quebec, and its attempts to stifle freedom of speech. It is evident that if the priest-party had remained silent, there would not have been half the attention called to the change in the sentiments of the former Roman Catholic French Father Mathew, that there now has been. By endeavoring to excite the worst passions of the bigoted; they have succeeded in enlisting the feelings of the reflecting and moderate French Canadians. By essaying to cut off the liberty of discussion, a narrow minded paper has had the completest success in arousing the most influential journals to proclaim far and wide the principles now so vigorously enunciated by Chiniqui. At Toronto, where the Journal of Quebec said Chiniqui had failed, an audience of the most respectable people of the city listened to his discourse, and the three principal journals, the next day, had full phonographic reports of his remarks.

The principles which he insisted upon, are, independence of the overpowering tyranny of the Bishops, and an appeal to the word of God as the rule for the government of the Church as well as the individual. It was by the reading of the New Testament that light broke in upon his own mind, and he constantly urges his hearers to seek that "fountain of light."

On the 12th of this month he arrived at his own parish of St. Anne, near Chicago. As it was evening, to his great surprise he found that his Church was illuminated, and his parishioners assembled to receive him. Not one had been drawn from the high position taken by them last August, when they declared themselves independent of the Bishop of Chicago. His people during his absence had regularly met together on Sunday for the purpose of prayer, psalm-singing, and reading the Bible. And thus the good work, commenced nearly a quarter of a century ago by a handful of devoted Swiss Christians of the Canton de Vaud, is bearing its fruit in the midst of the French Canadian population.

COMMERCIAL MEMORANDA.

The imports of foreign merchandise and dry goods at this port since January 1st, amounted to over $70,000,000; against which we have exported less than $18,000,000 of foreign and domestic produce and merchandise, and nearly $12,000,000 of specie. New York, as is known, receives two-thirds of the total foreign importations of the United States, and exports one-third of our total export. To bring the accounts of the port to the usual average, therefore, our exports to date should have been $35,000,000 instead of $30,000,000.

The deficiency is due to the failure of the Western crops last year. At this season we are usually shippers of grain and flour. Not a barrel of flour nor a bushel of wheat is now being sent from New York to Europe. Nor is it likely that any grain will be shipped until the fall unless the foreign crops should fail. At present prices, every shipment of breadstuffs insures a loss to the shipper.

On the other hand, while the failure of our Western grain crop and the low price of breadstuffs abroad prevented shipments of one of our great staples, our other staple—cotton—is doing better for the country than ever known before. We shall ship three millions of bales of the crop of 1858, which, at the present high rates, will yield a return fully one cent a pound higher than any previous crop. But for this fortunate circumstance the country would have been drained of gold to pay for the imports.

If, last fall, the Western crop had fulfilled the hopes entertained last spring, the United States would have been richer now than ever before, and people would not have believed that a revulsion could have occurred only eighteen months ago. So much depends on the great resources of a country; so little on the fluctuations of commerce, and casualties among the trading community.

If, next fall, both cotton and corn crops succeed, the United States will be richer and more prosperous in 1860 than ever before. The West will rise stronger than ever out of its sackcloth and ashes—sounder, wiser, and all the better in every way for the forced economies and the compulsory liquidation of 1858 and 1859. The whole country will thrill with life, energy, industry, and prosperity.

A very important element in the future is the movement and production of the precious metals. For three or four years the crop of gold in California and Australia has not varied. There is reason to believe that the combination of science and practical experience will, at least in California, largely increase the product of gold hereafter. Such is the opinion of the best-informed writers at San Francisco. New gold fields, too, are being opened. Gloomy as has been the experience of miners at Frazer's River, there is no doubt but some gold will come from thence this season. A small product may also be expected from Pike's Peak and Arizona.

Some eminent publicists are writing books to show that the demand for the precious metals is going to decline. This is the natural effect of commerce. Commerce being naturally a system of exchanges, the more general the commercial spirit becomes the less demand there will be for the precious metals as representatives of value. People will take the values themselves. Instead of gold and silver, they will take manufactures and merchandise. For some years the great consumers of gold and silver have been India and China. These nations consumed little foreign merchandise, and exported largely their own produce; the balance was paid them in specie. Now, it is believed, both India and China are going to increase their consumption of foreign wares and produce. Lord Elgin reports that British and American manufactures may be placed to advantage in many of the large interior cities of China. India, to which, in the long run, the late war will prove to have been a godsend, finds itself under a better government than that of the Company, with improved roads, better tenures, and more encouragement for enterprise. She will buy all the more cottons and hardware, and want all the less gold.

These considerations are very important; for if the drain of specie for the East were checked, a surprising impetus would be given to speculation in those countries where bank expansions are regulated by the amount of specie the banks contain.

For the present, however, the most important topic for the merchant to consider is the danger of over-importations this fall. We do not think the spring import too large, considering the wealth of the South, and the insignificant amount of foreign goods taken last year. Nor do we regard the bank expansion as excessive, though it is the largest ever reached. But if the fall importations are as large as those of the spring the merchants will run a great risk. Every fall, when the country banks require their balances, there is some activity in the money market here. Should the importations be very considerable this fall that activity might come upon the community so suddenly as to create a panic, and sound houses might in a sudden bank contraction, be compelled to suspend. It will not do for the merchants to trust to the banks. The banks do not always know enough to take care of themselves. Much less can they be trusted with the charge of the mercantile community. MEMORY.

The Count St. Germain had a wonderful memory. Any newspaper he read once he knew by memory; and was furnished with such a gigantic, comprehensive power of numbering, that he retained a series of a thousand numbers, which he could recite forward, backward, and pushed out from the middle. From the Court of Henry III. in Cracow, he demanded one hundred packs of piquet cards, mixed them together in disorder, bit him tell all the succession of the cards, ordered it to noted down exactly, and repeated their following, one after the other, without being wrong once. He played almost every musical instrument of the world, was an excellent painter, and imitated any hand-writing in the most illusive manner. He had but one passion—playing all games with absolute mastery. In chess no mortal had vanquished him, and in faro he could break every bank by calculation.

A CRY OF DISTRESS FROM ALEXANDER HUMBOLDT.—Berlin papers received by the City of Baltimore contain the following card from Alexander Humboldt:—

Suffering beneath the pressure of a still increasing correspondence, amounting to between sixteen hundred and two thousand communications per annum, and embracing letters, printed pamphlets on matters with which I am wholly unacquainted, manuscripts concerning which my opinion is desired, projects for emigration and colonizing, the sending of models, machines and natural curiosities, requests of contributions to collections of autographs, offers to take charge of my domestic concerns, to cheer and enliven me, etc., etc., I must again publicly urge all persons having my welfare at heart to exert their influence in my behalf, that individuals in both Continents may no longer busy themselves with my person and make of my house an intelligence office; and that I may be allowed, in the declining state of my physical and mental powers, to enjoy some rest and leisure to attend to my duties. May this cry for relief, which I utter with much reluctance and after reflection, not meet an unfriendly interpretation. ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT.

THOMAS F. MARSHALL.

A MEMPHIS correspondent of the Mississippi Baptist speaks as follows of the great Kentucky orator: "We have had another brilliant lecturer enrapturing our people for the past week. Perhaps Thos. F. Marshall has no living equal as an extemporaneous orator. His habits of life detract from his powers, and destroy the effect they might produce. I have listened to him, also, only once, and then with rapt attention. He is within himself a perfect illustration of that immortal saying of Napoleon le Grand, that "there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous." At times his wonderful flights of fancy, so bold, startling and original, would be continued till the intensity of interest experienced by his auditors would be so long protracted that the sensation was painful. I have seen the crowd spell-bound for ten minutes, every eye glaring upon the wild orator, while not a breath seemed to be inhaled by a single listener. When he came down from his aerial flight, with wit like that of Swift, as pungent as Addison's, and with grimaces and physical contortions which would put an ourang outang to the blush, he would relieve the exhausted crowd by making them laugh till their sides would ache. He never utters an angrammatical sentence, and rarely uses a word for which a better could be substituted; the deep current of his thoughts and the glittering surface of language through which you look down into the mirrored depths below, flow on as smoothly and brilliantly as those of Macaulay in his splendid Essays."

LOUIS NAPOLEON.

The N. Y. Commercial Advertiser, in publishing Louis Napoleon's letter to President Van Buren (which appeared in the Delta several days ago) remarks:

"Whatever may be our opinion of his policy, there is much of a genial nature and true manhood in Napoleon III., an illustration of which recently came to our knowledge. We may mention that the subjoined letter was left with the Rev. Mr. Stewart, chaplain in the U. S. Navy, by whom it was transmitted to the President. The friendship that then existed between Louis Napoleon and Mr. Stewart has continued to the present time; and we recently saw an autograph letter, address included, from the Emperor to that gentleman, written on the 12th of March, when he was bearing so important a share of the burdens of European politics and events, full of sentiments and feeling that would do honor to any man. The man cannot be without a heart formed for friendship who remembers its claims under such circumstances.

SOW BY THE WAYSIDE.

A CHRISTIAN travelling on a steamboat distributed tracts. While they were taken and read by many, a gentleman took one, and folding it up, cut it with a penknife into small pieces; then holding it up in derision, threw it away. One piece adhered to his coat; he picked it off, and looking at it, saw only the word "God." He turned it over; on the other side, "Eternity." They stood out as living words before him, "God," "Eternity." He went to the bar, called for brandy to drink to drive them away, but in vain. Then to the gambling-table, to social intercourse and conversation; but those solemn words haunted him wherever he went, until he was brought a penitent to the feet of Jesus. What an encouragement to the Christian traveler to sow seed by the way-side. In preparations for a journey, never forget the package of tracts. Scatter them, that you may thus win souls to your Saviour [American Messenger.]

NEGLECT OF PUNCTUALITY.

IN MANY cases this amounts to robbery. A committee, of eight ladies agreed to meet on a certain day, at twelve o'clock precisely. Seven of them attended punctually at the appointed hour; the eighth did not arrive till a quarter of an hour after. She came in, according to the usual mode, with "I'm sorry to be behind the time appointed; but really the time slipped away without my being sensible of it. I hope your goodness will excuse it. I am sure I beg pardon." One of the ladies, who was a Quaker, replied, "Truly, friend, it doth not appear clear to me that we ought to accept of thine apology. Hadst thyself only lost a quarter of an hour, it would have been merely thy concern; but, in this case, the quarter must be multiplied by eight, as we have each lost a quarter; so that there have been two hours of useful time sacrificed by thy want of punctuality." [Christian Miscellany.]

HEARING SERMONS.

THE state of a person's mind has much to do with the impression which a preached sermon makes upon it. Let a person be in a spiritual frame of mind, and quite an ordinary sermon, quite feebly delivered, will much interest him; while if he is in a dark unrealizing frame of soul touching divine things, quite an able discourse, delivered in a decidedly superior manner, will fail to be appreciated, and perhaps be subjected by him to captious criticism. The sad inefficiency of many sermons is owing full as much to the wrong state of the hearer's heart, as to the want of talent and fervor in the preacher. There was a man who went to sleep even under the preaching of the apostle Paul, and a large number of individuals who plumed themselves on the comprehensiveness and profundity of their learning, denominated him a babbler, and mocked at the inanity of his sayings.

A JUST SENTIMENT.

As our readers know, we have earnestly, and with what ability we have, opposed the fashionable and fastidious, Bible-tinkering mania which has prevailed in certain sections of late. Here is the view taken of the subject by an eminent literary man, whose judgment on a question of this sort is entitled to the first consideration. We clip as follows: Hon. George P. Marsh, in his last lecture on the English language remarked, that the attempt to modernize the style of the Bible is as absurd as it would be to translate Shakespeare into the dialect of our American Cousin. At the time when the present translation was made, the English language was, he thinks, in its best state for expressing the simple ideas of the Bible.

INTERESTING MEMENTOS.—The two swords left by the late Mr. Prescott to the Massachusetts Historical Society were formally presented at a meeting of the society in Boston, on the 14th instant, by Mr. H. Gardner, one of Mr. Prescott's executors. One of these swords was worn by Colonel Prescott, the grandfather of the historian, at the battle of Bunker Hill, and the other by Captain Lindzey, the grandfather of Mrs. Prescott, who on that day commanded the British sloop-of-war Falcon, which was playing with her guns upon the little redoubt which our countrymen had raised.

THE REVIVAL IN SWEEDEN is going on with unabating power. The demand for bibles and testaments is so great that it has not been supplied. The London Bible society circulated last year, in that country, 87,000 copies of the Bible and Testament.

THE BOSTON COURIER announces that Mr. Geo. Ticknor is preparing a life of Prescott, a work in which he will have the assistance of the eldest son of the historian, Mr. Wm. G. Prescott.

MORE EXCELLENT WAYS.

You remember the language of the Apostle Paul, about "a more excellent way," and with what an Apostle's zeal he pointed out that way to the Corinthian Church. One may say, that the clear-minded, comprehensive, earnest Paul was just here—Paul the "more excellent."

Great moments are occasionally given to all men; hours when they spring out of their common nature, and have a new, a sudden, a glorious enlargement of their being; seasons when they come very near to God, and receive blessings in thought, blessings in feeling, blessings in effort, beyond all ordinary experience. And Saint Paul had his times of wonderful exaltation. One of these was when he saw, in the intense spiritual splendors of Inspiration, the "more excellent way."

There is a principle here for us to adopt; namely, the "more excellent way," in everything that we think and do. We do not mean the Christian way, in opposition to the world's way and Satan's way of thinking and acting; but we wish to show, that Christians should always choose the best possible way, and faithfully adhere to it, both in modes of thought and activity.

Now, it is quite obvious, that in Christian modes of thinking and doing there is room for choice. Various ways may be Christian—more or less excellent—and hence there is always an opportunity to take a higher or a lower range, according to the dignity of our intellect and the devotion of our hearts to goodness. Let us not forget this fact; for it is vitally connected with our growth and usefulness. Not only are we to be men in Christ Jesus, but we are to have the utmost fulness of manhood. Not only are we to consecrate our being to God, but we are to expand that being to its utmost capacity, and thus present a nobler offering to Him.

The distinction here intimated is almost wholly neglected, even by good people; and the Church and Christianity are proportionably enfeebled. A man should dedicate his whole soul to God; that is admitted. But there is another duty also; namely, to see that he acquires as much soul as possible, and so become capable of making the best possible offering to God. Say, for illustration, that a man of common intelligence is converted to Christ, and enters his Church. As such, he consecrates himself to the cross. But mark, as such—namely, a man of common intelligence—he has no business to remain. The law of Christian growth binds him to improve his mind, to acquire wisdom, to cultivate his talents, to make the most of himself; and thus, working in the very ground of his nature, to increase his capacity to be a Christian. So too in business; a man should not be satisfied with glorifying God in the transactions of trade, but he should labor to increase his business in all just and prudent ways, so that he may be the more able to serve God in the offices of daily life, and by means of a generous benevolence. This is the "more excellent way."

This spirit should go into everything. The highest way is the best way. Responsibility applies as much to what we may be as to what we are. Grace enough to secure bare salvation, to keep us out of perdition, to take us just inside heaven—this ought not to be our limit. A large-minded religion, a great-hearted devotion to Christianity, ought to be our aim; and if this be wanting, although we may be saved, yet it will be as by fire. These singed robes are the garments of poor saints! The smell of fire should never cling to the apparel of immortality. And hence we are so earnestly exhorted to be fruitful, to abound in every good word and work, to go through life full-handed and full-hearted, to reach up to the fulness of the stature of men in Christ Jesus. But at this point Christianity fails with most of its disciples. It does a work within us; yes, but not the work in scope, depth, breadth that God designed. It has not free course. It is not glorified within us. The low maxims of the world, the earthly tone of thinking and feeling, the easy content with respectable goodness, the utter deadness to high and ennobling spirituality, are the characteristics of the great mass of piety. No wonder, then, that Christianity loses its practical impressiveness; for certainly nothing is more true, than that its manifestations in the character and life of its subject must assume a most marked and striking shape; must reveal its power and beauty through the higher forms of thought and feeling; must transfigure the whole nature, so that it shall be luminous with the indwelling of the divine glory—before it can, by means of human example, advance to the conquest of mankind.

No one should serve God in such a way as to rob that service of its genuine and attractive nobleness. No one should make his religion only a refined form of self-love and self-seeking. Christ ought to be a substitute for self in everything; and Christ in our will, affections, and aims, can thoroughly lift us out of that low experience, which deals in goodness as a sort of marketable thing, and dreads to pay too high a price for its pleasure and peace.

The worst of heresies is this religion of cold and barren utility; for it is a religion that serves God for gain, that never obliterates self and brings out in plenitude of grace and force the purer and loftier capacities of human nature. Nothing less is it, than bargaining for the merits of the blood of Jesus, by just so many tears of repentance, so many degrees of faith, so many ritual acts of piety, as will answer the purpose. Disguise it as we may, this is the prevailing religion of the day. A religion that prays, but not with strong cries, and mighty Jacob-like wrestlings; a religion that praises, but not with such jubilant hymns as David uttered, nor with such exulting outbursts as Paul delighted to employ in the lofty ecstasies of an overburdening joy; a religion that confesses, but not with freedom and gladness, yielding what is convenient rather than what is dear, offering the two coins, but forgetting it was all the poor widow had to give, and that the moral power of the act was in its unhesitatingness.

Such is the religion of the age. It has forsaken the "more excellent way;" and consequently God has a controversy just now with the Church, and He is mercifully stirring to arouse it to a proper appreciation of what Christianity ought to be, in its own heart, in its own life. The profoundest conviction of our soul is, that the most of our efforts, at this special juncture, ought to be directed to the Church. Our preaching, our literature, our systems of education, our benevolent institutions—everything belonging to us as a Christian organization—ought to be zealously devoted to elevating the piety of the Church, and training it for the "more excellent way." Extension of borders is not what we want; victories over the world, in the sense of new conquests, are not what we want. But more spirituality—the renewing of the Holy Ghost—a fresh baptism of fire in the Church—this is the immediate and urgent need; this ought to be the "one idea" at the present time. If the Church can be quickened, all other blessings will follow. Ministers and laymen will get out of the fashionable highway of half-hearted religion, and step boldly forth on the "more excellent way," we shall soon see wonderful results in the progress of the gospel.

Brethren of the Cross—as we write the words for an appeal to you—but the words rebuke us with a stern and solemn look; and yet, Brethren of the Cross, let us take this subject into the core of our hearts—this "more excellent way!"

LETTER FROM REV. WM. MURRAH.

Revival at Summerfield—One Hundred Conversions—Schools—Affecting Incident.

Mr. Editor—With sincere pleasure, I have to announce a most refreshing and gracious revival of religion in this place.

For sometime past encouraging indications of better times were visible in the congregation and among the members of the Church. Every appointment, whether for preaching or prayer, was made an occasion of special effort for the conversion of sinners, and quickening the Christians. They were not made in vain.

The week preceding Second Quarterly meeting, which was second Sabbath, inst., we had preaching every night—interest increased; often forty or more stricken ones at the altar for prayers, and from ten to twelve conversions at a service. The influence spread, until not only at the altar in the church, but in prayer-meetings, in class, and in the congregation, conversions were not a few.

The good work was chiefly in the schools; and yet I have not heard, nor do I believe, that a recitation was excused or a worse one had on account of the meetings. I strongly opine that proper discipline and successful teaching in our large schools are well nigh impracticable without the spiritual element. Nearly one hundred have professed conversion, quite a number of whom were members of the Church, but not converted; some fifty have joined on probation, others are advised not to join until they hear from home—as their parents are not professors, or belong to other denominations.

Taking the revival as a whole, I do not remember to have witnessed the like. I heard nothing from the pulpit that could be called big preaching; rather a disposition to preach to or at the people, than for them—home truths, well and warmly uttered, rather than fancy sketches. Our young brethren studying for the ministry were greatly blessed, and rendered valuable service. Our friends abroad may rest satisfied that their loved ones here will be cared for. The advice and pious lectures they receive from their respective Presidents in the school-room will not soon be forgotten by the young people; and then the weight and responsibility of a pastor's charge is sufficient to employ an angel's mind and heart.

The meeting closed last night, several mourners uncomforted. May they soon be converted! Several interesting incidents connected with the revival I should like to name, but I have only space for one.

On leaving the church one night, my attention was arrested by the wail of unutterable distress. It came from the lips of a young lady, rather off to herself, absorbed in thought and overwhelmed with deep emotion. "O my God!" said she, "what will become of my dear father—an old man, a sinner, a universalist—lives where there is no church? O God, have mercy on my father!"

I have no knowledge of the parties. My heart was affected—it needs no comment.

Many other things respecting this heaven-favored locality I would like to speak of, but must defer to another time.

W. Murrah.

METHODIST IMPROVEMENTS.

Bishop Andrew on Churches, Parsonages and Colleges.

Bishop Andrew concludes a letter to Southern Advocate on East Florida in the following style: So, it will be seen, that in our judgment it is time for the people of East Florida to rear up in every neighborhood neat and comfortable houses of worship; and as these houses are to be devoted to the worship of the glorious Author of all our blessings, let them be neatly finished, with neat enclosures, to indicate that the people around believe that Jehovah lives and reigns over all the neighborhoods of the earth, and that they design to honor him as the author and giver of all they have. I am very apt to judge of the piety, intelligence and taste of the people of any neighborhood through which I pass, by the appearance of the neighborhood church. When I pass through a neighborhood of large plantations, good dwelling houses, and gin-houses and stables to match, and then blunder upon the church—some old, dilapidated, unpainted, leaky concern, which will scarcely turn either wind or rain, looking like some deserted cow or sheep house—with no door, shutter, or half the hinges off, without even an enclosure for the grave-yard—I cannot help feeling that here truly dwells a people who neither reverence, love or fear any God but Mammon, and who have neither refinement or taste. But besides this, having built a neat house for God, let the Methodists in every circuit be sure to build a comfortable house for the preacher and his family, and have it comfortably furnished with plain and substantial furniture, so that the preacher who may be sent to the circuit may not be obliged to hunt half the year before he can find even a shanty to put his family into, and that unfurnished, and with neither corn nor meat provided for his wife and children to eat; but will on the contrary, know before hand that there is a home to which he can carry his beloved ones, and something to begin housekeeping with; then the preacher can enter upon his work with a light heart. What a change would be produced in the feelings of the preacher and the people towards each other. A kindly and liberal welcome to the preacher when he reaches his circuit, would cause him to enter upon his work in good heart and with a cheering prospect of success; and as the doing a clever thing always makes a man increase in his feeling of self-respect, the people having done well by the preacher, would feel a large increase of interest in him. Now, let all these things be duly considered by all concerned, and it will work a surprising change in the state of matters generally.

In connection with the matters above referred to, it is indispensable to the prosperity of Church and State that proper institutions of learning be established and sustained in the country, and the Methodist Church must have her proper place of influence in the control and conduct of these schools. My views on this important subject are generally known. I advocate denominational schools as of first importance; and, while we are willing that the State may, if it please her, establish schools supported from the public treasury, and while we are glad to see the various denominations establish their own schools, we are free to say, that we are anxious that Methodism should go abreast with the foremost in this matter; and, as Methodism has done as much, to say the least of it, as any other Christian people in planting the Church and Christianity in the early day in East Florida, and as she is, perhaps, even now numerically superior to any other Church, she is entitled and bound to do more towards educating the children of the country than any other. We shall, perhaps, in our next resume and conclude what we purpose saying on this subject.

DEATH OF BISHOP DOANE.

Rev. George W. Doane, Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church for the Diocese of New Jersey, died at Burlington at noon, on the 27th April last. He was an eloquent preacher, and a poet of considerable reputation. He had been in the episcopacy about twenty-seven years.

The characteristics of Bishop Doane, as a writer and speaker, says an exchange, were peculiar to himself, and hardly capable of imitation. His short, sparkling, graphic sentences, might well be said to be composed of "thoughts that breathe and words that burn." They form a succession of glowing pictures, which pass before the mind with a rapidity that is dazzling, and sometimes almost painful. His style is picturesque, luminous, pointed, and terse to a fault. In this respect it can hardly be better described than by saying that it is just the reverse of that of Chalmers. The prevailing fault of the one is its abruptness; of the other, its excess of elaboration.

BISHOP M'KENDREE.

A very considerable amount of discussion has taken place in the Richmond Advocate about M'Kendree's withdrawal in the O'Kelly times from the Methodist Episcopal Church, some contending that he only asked Asbury for his letter and held it a few days, and others that he held it long enough to amount to direct exclusion from the Church. Dr. Lee is of the latter view, and cites this passage from Asbury's Journal, volume 2, page 148:

"Sunday, 25th.—Came to Manchester..... I met the preachers in band, and found their fears were greatly removed; union and love prevailed, and all things went on well. W. M'Kendree and R. H—— sent me their resignation in writing. We agreed to let our displeased brethren still preach among us; and as Mr. O'Kelly is almost worn out, the conference acceded to my proposal of giving him his £40 per annum, as when he traveled in the connection, provided he was peaceable, and forbore to excite divisions among the brethern."

At the time of the withdrawal of M'Kendree considerable discord was created in the General conference—that of 1792—in consequence of some thinking that the Bishop had too much power in appointing the preachers. M'Kendree was in favor of giving the preachers an appeal from the appointing power to the conference, and the conference a veto over the power of the Bishop; but the measure failing he asked for his letter, which was granted. It was only a few months till he again joined.

THE SOUTH WESTERN BAPTIST.

This paper, published at Tuskegee, Ala., and edited by Revs. Samuel Henderson and H. E. Talliaferro, recently entered upon a new volume in an enlarged sheet, and the editors say, with better prospects than ever. It is an able paper, and edited with industry and spirit. Its career has been rather a stormy one, however. Loving controversy, it had but just emerged from an invasion of the territory of Methodism, with the benevolent intention of settling an supposed "balance-of-power" question therein, when a "revolution" at home, threatened to destroy the "directory" of the ecclesiastical "republic" and place the "First Consul," Mr. Graves, upon the throne of empire. Since then, it has been busy with home affairs. Right bravely, too, has it battled against the "usurpation." We regretted its earlier knight-errant expedition, but we have given it many a mental bravo while fighting the battle of self-defence. It has been true to Baptist principles. Whether it will engage in another war of conquest after the present civil war is ended, we know not. We will venture, however, to hope not, and to wish the South-Western Baptist a peaceful old age. "May its last days be its best days." We have always felt an interest in it, and wished it success. Though often compelled, by nature's first law, to "hold it off, to keep it from hurting us," we have always been sincerely friendly when we have tried to "pacify" it, instead of "fighting" it "hard."

REMARKABLE COTTON STATEMENT.

The Albion, a British paper published in New York, copies from a London exchange, the following statement, which professes to reveal a fact in regard to the amount or cotton grown in India, which, to us, is entirely new. The London paper says:

"At the Society of Arts, on the 23d ult., Dr. Forbes Watson, the successor of Dr. Royle at the India House, gave a most valuable paper on cotton in India. It showed a most comprehensive grasp of the subject, and pointed out the true difficulty of the cotton question in Bombay, namely, transport; and he urged the completion of the cotton railways as early as possible. He vindicated the propriety of having well constructed railways, although he advocated the improvement of rivers, and the extension of canals, roads and irrigation.

"According to Dr. Watson, the production of cotton in India is equal to twice that of the United States; but the quantity exported has been very small. Where means of transport are provided by nature, there the export has increased; but where the means of transport depended upon the late honorable Company, the export of the richest districts in the world has remained stationary. Of this, abundant confirmation was given by Mr. Price, a merchant, who opened up the large Dharwar cotton trade, now amounting to 80,000 bales yearly. His trade had been stopped by the want of roads, and the inability of the government, for want of funds, to repair the roads! Col. Sykes, who was present to vindicate the late government, became very angry at the turn the discussion took, and charged Mr. J. B. Smith, M. P., the chairman, that the miserable state of the Indian cotton export, was the fault of the cotton manufacturers of Manchester, who might have sent out to India, and bought as much as they liked!"

JOHN RANDOLPH'S "REMORSE."

Mr. R. D. Parish, the son of the physician who attended Mr. Randolph in his last sickness, communicates the following account, from his father's papers, of the circumstances under which the dying statesman, eccentric even in death, uttered the word "remorse."

"He now made his preparations to die, and described minutely how his dress was to be arranged, his faithful servant John arranged it all to suit him, etc.

"For a short time he laid perfectly quiet, his eyes were closed, and I concluded he was disposed to sleep. He suddenly roused from this state with the words "Remorse," "Remorse!" It was twice repeated, the last time at the top of his voice, evidently with great agitation. He cried out—"Let me see the word," (no reply followed, having learned enough of the character of my patient to ascertain that when I did not know exactly what to say, it was best to say nothing.)

"He then exclaimed, "Get a dictionary, let me see the word." I cast my eyes around and told him I believed there was none in the room.

"Write it down then! Let me see the word." I picked up one of his cards from the table, "Randolph of Roanoke," and enquired whether I should write it on that. "Yes, nothing more proper." Then with my pencil I wrote 'Remorse."—He took the card in his hands in a hurried manner and fastened his eyes on it with great intensity. "Write it on the back," he exclaimed. I did so, and handed it to him again; he was excessively agitated at this period. He repeated, "Remorse!" "You have no idea what it is; you can form no idea of it whatever; it has contributed to bring me to my present situation; but I have looked to the Lord Jesus Christ, and hope I have obtained pardon." He then said, "now let John, (his slave,) take your pencil and draw a line under the word," which was accordingly done. I enquired "what was to be done with the card," he replied, "Put it in your pocket—take care of it—when I am dead, look at it."

The Rev. W. H. Crenshaw died suddenly at his residence, in Baton Rouge, on Sunday morning, the 1st inst. Mr. Crenshaw was a native of Tennessee, but has been a resident of that city for many years, where his public spirit, generous heart, and kindly disposition endeared him to all. He was about 45 years of age. On Saturday night he was unusually cheerful, and was confident of being able to be out next day. During the night, or early Sunday morning, his danger became apparent. He expired at half-past 8 A. M., and was interred next morning with Masonic honors. A large concourse of citizens attended the remains to their final place of repose.

The Huntsville Advocate understands that D. Johnson the County Treasurer, has received from Bishop Cobbs the sum of $960, restored to the public funds by some one who became years ago wrongfully possessed of them. The Bishop says it is useless to attempt to discover from whence the money comes. The unknown person now makes restitution through the Bishop. To err is human—to make amends for that error is almost divine, and is what is not often done in this life.

NEW ORLEANS AND HOUSTON RAILROAD.

The work upon the Texas end of this road, the section between Houston and the Sabine, is going ahead finely. The last Houston Telegraph says:

"The workmen on the New Orleans and Texas road are doing a good business now, grading about half mile a day. There are about 50 carpenters at work on the bridges and culverts along the first twenty-five miles of the line. We confidently expect to go over the first section of this road by mid-summer at farthest."

We trust the Company, which has secured the extension of its charter on this side of the line, will commence preliminary operations in Louisiana with as little delay as practicable. Steps we trust will be taken by the Texas Company to give New Orleans a chance to co-operate in the work of uniting the two States in the hard noose of iron matrimony, never to be untied or broken. Bulletin.

War in Europe, as will be seen by our very ample foreign news department, seems to be inevitable. An Austrian army of 120,000 has crossed the Ticino into Sardinia, and an engagement was hourly expected. Strange enough, all the European powers, including England and Prussia, seem to be against the position of Austria. Far as she has gone, we are of opinion she will back down in view of her isolation, and that, as we have frequently said before in the Advocate, they will not fight.

Bishop Davis of S. C.—It is with deep commiseration that we read the following in the Walterboro Sun of Wednesday: On Sunday last the Rev. Mr. Bellinger announced to his congregation the melancholy fact, that the Rt. Rev. Bishop Davis, of the Diocese of South Carolina, had almost entirely lost his sight. His only hope is by an operation for cataract.

Movement of Colored Men.—The colored people of Chicago, at a meeting on the 25th ult., which was very numerously attended, adopted resolutions declaring it the imperative duty of every free colored man in the United States to emigrate to Hayti; and appointed a committe to open a correspondence on the subject with that Republic.

A Bishop for Texas.—The Protestant Episcopal Convention of Texas, on Friday last, elected Rev. Alex. Gregg, of Cheraw, S. C., Bishop of that Diocese. Having at length elected a Southern man, (as they should have done at first) after several Northern declinatures, we trust he will accept.

President Buchanan has just completed his sixty eighth year.

Our News Department, this week, is unusually full and interesting.

Bishop Pierce's Letters commence next week.

THE EXPECTED EUROPEAN WAR.

The Picayune, considering the Peace Congress broken up, gives the prominent features of the contest about to commence in Europe. It shows that Sardinia is the champion of liberal and progressive ideas in Europe, and that Austria stands upon old treaties, through which she has aggrandized herself, to the great injury of the Italian States.

"She has treaties with Naples, and Parma, and Modena, and Tuscany, by which they are almost dependent, little less than fiefs of the Austrian Empire. These, Count Cavour, for Sardinia, expects that she shall renounce. The policy which he puts forth as that of Sardinia, is to require of Austria, "not by virtue of treaties, but in the name of the principles of humanity and eternal justice," to provide a separate nationality for Lombardy and Venitia, to withdraw from the rest of Italy within her own possessions, and annul the conventions by which she exercises sway there. Contingent upon these is the proposition that liberal institutions should be invited and encouraged in these States, thus emancipated from Austria."

In such a conflict, the Picayune says, Sardinia will have the sympathies and good wishes of every lover of free institutions and constitutional government. The Picayune then proceeds:

"But the strangest feature of this conflict is, that in the war which springs out of these liberalized views, Sardinia is prompted by the French Emperor, and supported by the scarcely concealed sympathy of the Emperor of Russia; and that Austria has had—at least up to the moment of the breaking out of the war—the moral support of England and the general favor of the German people, among whom constitutional forms and popular progress have made the greatest advances. Russia and France have moved forward in the interest of a cause which demands the revision of treaties and the reconstruction of boundaries, in order to promote the elevation of the popular masses in the scale of political influence, while England and Germany have seemed to maintain despotism, by demanding a rigid observance of the forms and engagements with which it is entrenched against improvement."

This, says the Delta, "is a curious, but we predict will be a very transient state of parties. The English people will never stand by the Ministry in any such attitude, and Russia will encourage Sardinia until Austria is sufficiently humbled and weakened for her purpose—her ambition is to control the German States."

The Bee, concluding that war is inevitable, shows how different a game it will be from what it was half a century ago.

"With railroads, Minie rifles, Armstrong and Paixhan guns, and a hundred other improvements in the devilish engineery of battle, it is manifestly impossible for war to linger through a dozen campaigns, diversified by chronic sieges and wearisome but innocent blockades. Armies may be transported in a few hours to distant points, where days or weeks were formerly required. The slaughter on a well contested field, with all the destructive perfection of modern firearms, would be five times that of any of the battles of Napoleon, equal numbers being assembled. The strongest and best equipped armies would melt away under so annihilating a process, and peace would necessarily result from the exhaustion of the combatants. Fifty years ago Sebastopol would have been impregnable. At this time there is probably no fortress in the world capable of resisting a well-directed, vigorous and preserving attack. The war, therefore, will hardly last long enough to tire the patience of the world. It will be quick and smashing work all round; all the better, perhaps, if it convinces princes and potentates that it is too terrible a sport even for reckless ambition to indulge in."

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE BIBLE CAUSE.

Auburn, May 5th, 1859.

Mr. Editor: I am glad to acknowledge the receipt of money through letters, to the Bible cause. I have recently opened three with noble contributions to this cause. One, from Guerrytown, Alabama. One, from Eufaia; and one, from a lady in Matagorda, Texas. May the Divine blessing abide richly upon these offerings, and upon these who have so kindly bestowed them. Who will follow this worthy example of liberality? Do you not in your hearts commend it? Is it not worthy of praise and of imitation? Then why delay to make your offering? Perhaps you have purposed in your heart to give something to this cause, but you have postponed it to some future time—say, to next fall or winter. This is wrong. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest." Many Christian people keep their money by them, because they are too indolent or stingy to put it to work. Is it the first? then "go to the ant thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise. Is it this second? "Beware of covetousness, which is Idolatry." Do I address some who are idolators in this sense, who love their God, love the Bible, love souls, less than their money? Is it you, my brother? What have you done this year towards circulating God's word? Do not let another week pass without doing something—something worthy of an Alabamian and a Christian. Do not force God and His cause to wait so long your convalence. What would have been done the present year for this cause, had everybody delayed as you are doing?

Have you laid in your stock of goods? Have you saved your seed for a crop? Then turn your money into Bibles, which is "incorruptible seed," and scatter them broadcast over the Land—"now them beside all waters."

Let the ladies of Alabama remember the contribution of their Texas sister, and see if they cannot do something for their own State.

In six counties in Alabama over 1200 families were found without the Bible. Christian friends, can you sleep and pray over this, and not give? I wait to receiv your contribution, may God speed it. Address me at Auburn, Alabama.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

A NOBLE PROPOSITION.

A Proposition to the Local Preachers and Exhorters of the Alabama Conference.

Dear Brethren—I propose to be one of 250, to pay $10 annually for ten years, to send missionaries to China, and support them and the Mission. This money to be paid 1st November, or in time to go up to the Annual Conference. Also, I propose to be one of 250 to pay $5, as above, for any foreign Mission that the Board may choose to apply it to; these donations to be above the amount we usually give.

Dear brethren, I have had this matter under prayerful consideration for some time. I am a very poor man—have to work hard for my support and that of my family. I am confident that God will make it up to us in some way. This would raise annually the sum of $3750, which would greatly aid in sending the gospel to the heathen. Let us raise the amount, and pray God to raise up the men. Now I request each Presiding Elder to bring this matter before each Third Quarterly Meeting Conference, so that the local preachers and exhorters may understand it.

A Local Preacher.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Yorkville Mission.—Rev. W. B. Owinge writes: "This Mission was constituted at the last Conference. I did not receive the appointment till the First Quarterly meeting. I have seven preaching places; have organized five societies; received ninety-four into full connection, (eighty of this number transferred from Columbus Circuit) thirteen on probation; baptized fifteen infants, one adult; catechized one hundred and fifty; preached to about five hundred. The prospect is much better than I anticipated; many of the owners, both in and out of the Church, take deep interest in the work."

Linden.—Rev. A. J. Crawford writes: That they have recently closed a very pleasant meeting in Linden, which resulted in some conversions, and some twelve or thirteen additions to the Church.

Talladega District.—Rev. W. D. Matthews writes us, that he is pleased to find a growing interest in the Advocate in the mountain region of the Alabama Conference. We have a preemption right to that region. Our first ministerial labors were there.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

Arrival of the Niagara.

Threatening Attitude of Austria—The Crisis at Hand—Austria Rejects England's Final Proposition—Declaration of War Impending—Austria's Ultimatum to Sardinia—French and Austrian Armies Moving—Panic on the Paris Bourse

Halifax, May 5.—The Cunard steamship Niagara, Captain Ryrie, arrived at this port this evening. She left Liverpool on Saturday, the 23rd ult., and brings advices from Liverpool three days later than those received by the North Briton.

The Niagara's political advices are of a most important character, and indicate that the crisis in reintion to the Italian question is at hand.

Political and General Intelligence.

Liverpool, April 23.—The advices from the Continent are more alarming than ever, and the threatening attitude of Austria confirms the belief that war is inevitable.

Austria has sent an ultimatum to Sardinia, in which Austria makes a formal demand upon Sardinia to disarm and dispose of the volunteers which are flocking to the Sardinian standard from all parts of Italy.

Three days are given by Austria to Sardinia for a reply to the demand, and if at the end of that period no reply is made, or a refusal is returned, Austria will declare war.

Austria is vigorously preparing for the latter alternative, and large bodies of troops are in motion.

Eighty thousand more Austrian troops have been ordered to the Ticinn on the frontier of Sardinia.

The cabinet of Austria has rejected the final propositions of the English cabinet, and the prospects of a Peace Congress appear to be at an end.

Large bodies of French troops are moving towards the Sardinian frontier, and warlike preparations in France are carried on with renewed vigor.

There was a panic in the Paris Bourse and a heavy decline in the French funds.

Further Details.

England Protests against Austria's Menace to Sardinia—Austria Refuses to Recede.

Liverpool, April 23.—The three days given by Austria to Sardinia for the consideration of the demand to disarm and dismiss her volunteers expires on the 29th inst.

The Cabinet of England had addressed a telegraphic dispatch to that of Vienne, protesting very strongly against the menacing attitude Austria has assumed towards Sardinia.

The Austrian Cabinet, however, refuses to consider her resolution, and has already prepared a manifesto to accompany her declaration of war against Piedmont.

The Easter holiday prevented the full effect of this news transpiring in England.

The French Funds.—The news of the Austrian ultimatum and the refusal of Austria to accede to the propositions of England, created a panic in the French Funds at Paris, and the Three per Cents fell fully 3f on the Paris Bourse.

England's Final Propositions.—The final propositions submitted to Austria by the English Cabinet were in substance a general disarmament of all the armed powers, and the consent of Austria to the admission of Sardinia and the other Italian States to the Peace Congress.

To these propositions all the powers except Austria readily assented, and immediately upon the rejection of these propositions, Austria sent her ultimatum to Sardinia.

Last Chance of Peace Vanishing.—The London journals express the opinion, which is generally entertained in England, that the last chance of peace has about vanished.

The Austrian army is making strategetical movements on the Ticino, and an attack was considered probable at any moment.

The Austrian Army in Motion.

An Immediate Attack Feared—European Cabinets in Council—Army of Paris under Orders.

Liverpool, Saturday Noon, April 23.—The latest advices by telegraph in London and the Continent, foreshadow the approach of actual hostilities on the Sardinian frontier.

No one entertains the belief that Sardinia will even seriously consider the ultimatum of Austria, but will, on the contrary, promptly reject it, in which case the Austrian troops will immediately cross the Ticino and attack the Sardinian army.

The French Government have received a telegraph dispatch from Gen. Marmora, who is on the Sardinian frontier, announcing that the Austrian army had made a significant movement on the strategetical line of the Ticino, and that he (General Marmora) feared that an attack migh be made by the Austrian troops at any moment.

The Emperor Napoleon had called a council of Ministers, and had a council upon the present crises of Italian affairs.

The King of Sardinia had also called a council of Ministers and held a consultation as to the course the Government should pursue under the present threatening attitude assumed by Austria.

Nothing definite has transpired in relation to the decision of the Cabinet, but it is generally believed that Sardinia will peremptorily reject the ultimatum of Austria, and accept the alternative.

The Paris Constitutionel announces that a portion of the army of Paris has received orders from the War Office to be in readiness to march to the Sardinian frontier at a moment's notice.

Further by the Niagara.

War Spirit at Fever Heat—A French Army on the Rhine—Austrian and Prussian Treaty—Archduke Albrecht's Mission—Prussian Military Movements—Disturbances in Italy and Servia—The Pope Unable to Raise Troops—Insurrectionary Spirit in Turkey—100,000 Russians in Bessarabia.

Liverpool, April 23.—The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Herald says that the preparations for war are pushed forward with feverish rapidity throughout France, notwithstanding the professions of the Emperor that he is willing to disarm.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says that armaments continue on the most extensive scale, not only in France, Sardinia and Austria, but also in Prussia and the German States, and that the war spirit is at fever heat.

French troops are concentrating from all quarters at Lyons, near the Sardinian frontier, and a large reinforcement of the African contingent is daily expected to arrive at Marseilles from Algiers.

A large French army is about to be collected on the frontier of the Rhine, and numerous cavalry regiments are already on the march thither.

It is announced that the mission of the Austrian Archduke Albrecht was entirely successful, and that a convention has been entered into between Austria and Prussia, and signed by their respective plenipotentaries, in which the Prussian Government agrees to send to the Rhine an army of observation numbering 28,000 men, under the command of the Prince Regent, in case the negotations for a pacific settlement should fail.

The contingent force of Bavaria is to be increased to 60,000 men. To this force is also to be added one-eighth of the army of the German confederation, and a corps of 60,000 men of other contingents is to be held in readiness for immediate action.

The newspaper press in Prussia have been requested not to publish any thing respecting these preparations. The Prussian Government have ordered an additional corps d'Armis of 70,000 to be placed on a war footing, but officially announces that these measures are adopted purely on the defensive, and are not to interpreted as indicating that Prussia designs taking any active part in the conflict between France and Austria so long as the war is confined to Italy.

The Turin correspondent of the London Times expresses the conviction which is generally entertained in Piedmont, that unless war is declared, Count Cavour must fall, and that such event would possibly be the signal for an insurrection in various parts of Italy, and also in Servia.

In case war is not declared, there is great danger of serious disturbances breaking out in Sardinia, where already 30,000 volunteers have been collected from all parts of Italy, most of whom would join the revolutionists rather than submit longer to Austria domination.

These volunteers are confidently awaiting the commencement of hostilities, and would hail a declaration of war with enthusiasm, while many thousands more are ready to join the standard of Piedmont.

All the steamers on Lake Maggiore (at the source of the Ticino, and between Sardinia and Lombardy) with one exception, had been placed at the disposal of the Austrian government, for the transportation of troops and war materials.

Naples and Rome.

The King of Naples still survived at last accounts, but was at his "last legs."

The Government of Rome had sent a circular to the bishops, urging upon them to use all their influence in collecting two additional legions of troops, but notwithstanding the exertions of the bishops and the offering of the large bounty, which was authorized by the Pope to be granted to all volunteers, the attempt to raise troops was unsuccessful.

Turkey and the Principalities.

Advices from Turkey represent that the appearance of the near approach of war, has aroused fears of serious Insurrection among the Greek subjects of the Sultan, and also in the Principalities of Wallachia Moldavia and Montenegro.

Russian Armaments.

The previous report of the extensive Russian armaments in Bessarabia are confirmed, and it is the intention of the Russian Government to assemble an army of 100,000 men in the Province of Georgia.

Paul Morphy's Triumphs.—Paul Morphy, the chess champion, it is expected will leave for the United States in the next steamer for New York. He is still in London, where he has played another blindfold game with ten good players simultaneously. Of the ten games he won eight and two were drawn after playing seven hours.

FOUR DAYS LATER.—ARRIVAL OF THE ANGLO-SAXON.

Queenec, May 9.—The steamship Anglo-Saxon, Captain Borland, of the Liverpool and Canadian line, arrived at this port this morning, with European dates to the 27th ult.

Cotton Market.

Liverpool, April 27.—The sales of Cotton for two days, Monday and Tuesday, were limited to 9000 bales. The market was closed on Saturday on account of the Easter Holidays. There is a partial decline in Cotton of ¼d. since the sailing of the Niagara. The decline is chiefly confined to the Middling and lower grades. The market closed with a declining tendency. The quotations are irregular and unreliable.

The Approaching War.

Liverpool, April 27.—The crisis in continental affairs still continues, no actual declaration of war having yet been made.

The latest telegraph advices from the continent indicate that actual hostilities can not long be delayed.

Austrian troops continue to pour into Lombardy.

The Austrian army on the Ticino, it is expected, may cross over into Piedmont at any moment.

Large bodies of French troops continue to march towards the frontier of Piedmont, and the French troops on the frontier are entering the Sardinian territory, being urged forward with the utmost dispatch.

It is reported that France has concluded an offensive and defensive treaty of alliance with Russia.

A loan of 500,000,000 francs has been announced by the French Government.

The French funds are greatly depressed in consequence, and a general panic on the Bourse was the result.

Further by the Anglo Saxon.

Sardinia's Answer to the Ultimatum—Austria Extends the Time—Victor Emanuel Commands his Army—Russo-French Alliance Startles England—Napoleon's Departure for the Army—Victor Emanuel made Dictator—The Powers Protest Against Austria.

Political and General Intelligence.

Liverpool, April 27.—The Sardinian Cabinet has replied to the Austrian ultimetum, but the tenor of the reply has not yet transpired. It is reported that Austria has extended the time for the final answer of Sardinia to the ultimatum fourteen days longer.

The Austrian army on the Ticino have assumed a very threatening position, and it is momentarily expected that they will cross the Ticino into Sardinia.

It is also reported that Austrie had agreed to another proposed medintion, but the report lacks confirmation.

The greatest activity prevails in all the military and naval departments throughout France.

The French legislative body met on the 26th at Paris, to receive the Government statement relative to the present crisis in Europe, and to sanction the loan of 500,000,000 francs. Count Walewski in making the official explanation before that body threw all the blame of the approaching war upon Austria, and defended the policy of France, as being favorable to peace. The French contingent for the year has been raised to 140,000 men instead of 80,000.

England, Russia, and Prussia unite in protesting against the conduct of Austria in precipitating the war by her aggressive policy, and throws the responsibility of the approaching conflict upon her.

The French channel fleet had sailed from Cherbourg with sealed orders, but it was reported and generally believed that it was b

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

MAY 11, 1859.

...weak policy of England under the present Administration and says that this policy has forced France to form an alliance with Russia.

Further by the Anglo-Saxon.

The French Minister ordered from Vienna—Empress Eugenie to be Regent—Austrian and Prussian Alliance.

LIVERPOOL, April 27.—The French Minister at Vienna had received his passports, and the Austrian Government had ordered him to quit Vienna and withdraw his legation at once.

The question of the French Regency had been a subject of discussion in the French Cabinet, in anticipation of the contingency the Emperor's death would occasion, and the Empress would probably be appointed to the Regency. Prince Jerome was also spoken of in the same connection.

An Austrian correspondent of the London Times says that Austria was previously informed of the intention of Austria to conclude an alliance with Sardinia, and that therefore the faithful union of Austria and Prussia upon the Italian question is provided for, not, however, without some doubts.

THREE DAYS LATER.—Arrival of the Adelaide.

Further Decline in Cotton—Hostilities about to Commence without a Declaration of War—120,000 Austrians Crossed the Ticino.

ST. JOHN, N. F., May 9.—The new steamer Adelaide, of the Galway line, arrived at this port this evening, bringing advices from Liverpool to Saturday, the 30th ult., three days later than those by the Anglo-Saxon.

Cotton Market.

LIVERPOOL, April 30.—The sales of Cotton during the week amount to 30,000 bales. All qualities of Cotton have declined during the week ¼ to ½d. The market closed quiet at the following quotations of the Brokers' Circular: Orleans—Fair 7¼, Middling 6¾; Uplands—Fair 7¼, Middling 6¾. The quotations are irregular and the market unsettled, owing to alarming news from the Continent and the general disquietude which prevails in England.

Political Intelligence.

Actual hostilities have not yet commenced and no declaration of war has been made, but the movements of the different armies in Italy show that actual war can no longer be prevented, and the announcement of hostilities is momentarily expected.

Decidedly hostile movements are being made on every hand. The Austrians have taken the initiative by crossing the Ticino into Sardinian territory with 120,000 men, and French troops are pouring into Piedmont by land and sea.

Further by the Adelaide.

The Russo-French Alliance Denied.—Crossing the Ticino not Officially Confirmed.—Tuscany Joined France and Sardinia.—Heavy Features in London.

GALWAY, Ireland, April 30.—Telegraph dispatches from London to the Associated Press, state that the report that an Austrian army of 120,000 men had crossed the Ticino into Sardinia, is not officially confirmed.

All descriptions of stocks are greatly depressed, and an many forty failures and suspensions have occurred among stock brokers.

It is announced that Tuscany had formed an alliance with France and Sardinia, and had joined her forces with those of the latter powers.

The reported offensive and defensive alliance between Russia and France is denied by officials at Paris, but the London Times describes the provisions of the treaty, with such proofs of its existence as to leave little doubt of the correctness of the report set out by the Anglo-Saxon.

It is generally believed that hostilities cannot now be avoided, although the announcement of the Russo-French alliance has occasioned rumors that Austria was willing to recede from the propositions of England for a pacific settlement of Italian affairs.

The announcement of the treaty, and the publication of its provisions in the Times, caused a great panic on the London Exchange, and consols went down at one time as low as 88, but afterwards rallied, and closed at 89¼.

DOMESTIC.

Washington Items.

WASHINGTON, May 5.—Our Government does not believe in the reports that have been circulated in regard to the policy of the English Government in Mexico.

The Cabinet believes that the British Minister at Mexico is not acting under the instructions of his government in the steps he has taken, but that he will be instructed by his government to recognize the Juarez Government.

Judge Cradlebaugh of Utah, has been removed by the President.

Judge Greenwood, of Arkansas, has accepted the position to which he has been appointed by the President, of Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

War Vessels Ordered to the Gulf.

An additional number of vessels are to be dispatched to the Gulf for the protection of American property and citizens as far as possible.

Mr. McLane, our Minister to Mexico, expresses undoubted confidence in the ultimate success of the Jeurez Government.

Judge Vondersmith Sentenced.

PHILADELPHIA, May 5.—Judge Vondersmith, who has been convicted of forgery, was sentenced to-day to twenty years imprisonment and a fine of $5000, besides having to restore to the Government $30,000 of the money fraudulently obtained.

A Forger Absconded.

CINCINNATI, May 6.—James N. Duboys, one of the clerks in the Hamilton and Dayton Railroad office, in this city, has been arrested in the forgery of a check on the Lafayette Bank for $700.

The discovery was not made, however, until after Duboya had received the money on the check and absconded. No clue has been obtained as to his where about.

[The telegraph lines were interrupted last night by rain storms, and we were unable to get our usual report of the markets and current events. The National Line yesterday morning was working with its usual promptness, and performed a feat which is seldom been accomplished by any other line in the country of equal length; but which Mr. Davis, the manager, and Messrs. Shephard and Jones, the electricians, inform us, is not an extraordinary thing with the National Line. The wires were connected through the Louisville office, where dispatches are usually received, as all dispatches were transmitted direct from the New Orleans office to the office in Wall street, New York, and answers received with the utmost promptness. The communication between the two offices, over 2000 miles of wire, was carried on with as much ease and almost as rapidly as a conversation between two persons in the same room; in fact the art of telegraphy has been reduced to electric conversation on the National Line, as all their operators receive communications entirely by sound, and with greater facility than by the old method. [Delta.]

The Adams' Express Robery.

NEW YORK, May 8.—Mr. Merony, who was formerly this agent of the Adams' Express Company at Montgomery, was arrested in this city on Saturday night, on suspicion of having been connected with the robbery of $40,000 from the Adems' Express, some months since. Maroney was about to leave for Europe. He was held to bail in the sum of $80,000.

Extensive Steamboat Conflagration—Ten Steamboats Burnt!

PITTSBURG, May 8.—An extensive steamboat conflagration occurred here this morning. Ten steamboats were entirely destroyed, and some thirty others barely escaped the flames.

THE ACQUITTAL OF MR. SICKLES.

The wide-spread interest in this case justifies the publication of the following graphic account of the excitement at the acquittal. We have published none of the offensive details of the trial; but the account below has nothing offensive, and is the best comment on the temper of the American people in such cases.

The retiring of the jury, at 1:50, was the signal for throwing off the restraint which had up to this time weighed upon every one in Court. Lawyers, officers, spectators and all, seemed to think themselves at liberty to talk as much as they pleased, and to give vent to their feelings and impressions. All got to their feet and indulged in conversation. Many crowded around the dock to cheer and support Mr. Sickles in this the pregnant moment of his fate. Among those who gathered round Mr. Sickles was an estimable clergyman of this city, the Rev. Dr. Sunderland, of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, who, taking Mr. Sickles by the hand, said: "Sir, I have come to express to you my heartfelt sympathy, and to say that if the voice of the people of this city could speak at this moment, your acquittal would be instantaneous. In case, however, an adverse verdict should be rendered be assured that you have hearts around you, and not the least warm of them, to sustain you in your affliction." Mr. Sickles was much moved by this incident, and expressed his thanks as well as his emotion would permit him.

As the time wore on, the noise and confusion grew greater and the Judge, in a good-natured manner, remarked that, although under the circumstances he could not expect the audience to keep silence, he hoped there would be a slight regard exhibited for the place where they were.

As the minutes grew into quarters and half hours, there was some expression of disappointment on the part of many, who thought the jury should not have retired at all, much less spend any time in consultation. It should not be said, however, that there was any straining anxiety or apprehenson exhibited.

The clock struck 3, and before the sound had passed away, there was a movement at the door by which the jury had retired, indicative of their being on the point of re-entering the Court.

The door is opened. The Deputy Marshal calls out to make room for the jury. In they come, one by one, and proceed to take their seats in the box. There is one general movement in the Court-room to get a look at their faces. All restraint is forgotten. Benches and forms and tables are mounted by the most excited or most venturesome. "Here they come," is hurriedly spoken on all sides. Then there is a succession of cries of "Down in front," "Get off the beaches," "Sit down," "Silence in Court," "Order," "Order." But it seems impossible to restore order till the Judge directs the Clerk to call the names of the jury. The uproar instantly subsides, and as the Clerk calls the jurors and they severally respond, one of the officers calls out the number. When the twelfth name was called and responded to, a pin might ho heard to drop in the suddenly stilled Court.

The jury are all standing.

Clerk—Daniel E. Sickles, stand up and look to the jury.

Mr. Sickles stood up.

Clerk—How say you, gentlemen, have you agreed to your verdict?

Mr. Arnold—We have.

Clerk—How say you, do you find the prisoner at the bar, guilty or not guilty?

Mr. Arnold—not guilty!

As these words fell from the lips of the foreman, there was one loud, wild, thrilling tumultuous hurrah sent up by the spectators; cheer after cheer resounded in the Court-room, and it was taken up by the multitude on the outside and repeated. Hats and handkerchiefs were waved, and there was one general rush toward the dock.

In the midst of the uproar the theatorian voice of Mr. Stanton was heard addressing the Court in these words: "I move that Mr. Sickles be discharged from custody."

Marshal Seldon—Come to order, gentlemen; come to order. This is a place were there should be no noise.

No one paid any attention to the Marshal.

Mr. Staaton.—(Boiling over with excitement)—"In the name of Mr. Sickles, and of his counsel, I desire to return thanks to the jury."

Judge Crawford, (who appeared to be the only person in this Court not excited)—Mr. Stanton, wait till the verdict is recorded.

Mr. Stanton—Of course, your Honor, you must excuse excitement on this occasion.

Clerk to the Jury—Your record is, gentlemen, that you find Daniel E. Sickles "Not guilty."

The Jury nodded affirmatively.

Clerk—And so say you all.

Another affirmative nod from the jury.

Mr. Stanton—I now move that Mr. Sickles be discharged from custody.

Judge Crawford—The Court so orders.

Mr. Sickles, amid the renewed cheers of the audience, was taken out of the dock by Capt. Wiley and Mr. Brega; the former, who is one of Mr. Sickles's most devoted friends, kissed him at the moment of his deliverance, and held fast by him as they tried to make their way to the door. It was slow work, for congratulations, earnest, loud and frankly expressed, saluted Mr. Sickles at all points. Though strong emotion was exhibited in the swollen veins in his temples, his eye was calm and steady, and the effort which he manifestly made to retain calmness and composure was successful. His expression betrayed no feeling of joy, but was rather that of a man who felt conscious that he had run no risk, and that the trial through which he had passed could have had no other result.

It was some minutes before Mr. Sickles could reach the jury-box, which lay on his road to the door. The jury evinced a desire to congratulate him, and he stepped over the forms to their salutations, which were heartily tendered.

Finally, by dint of much crushing and great exertion, a passage to the door was effected, and as soon as Mr. Sickles was recognised from the outside, the cheers were again taken up.

The news ran like wild fire through the city, and from all sides crowds were thronging to the City Hall. The excitement was as intense as it was instantaneous.

As Mr. Sickles stepped down the stone stairs of the City Hall, surrounded and supported by his immediate personal friends, he was enthusiastically cheered.

With considerable exertion, for he was fast becoming faint, he was got into one of the numerous carriages in waiting. In the same carriage were Messrs. Graham, Wiley and Brown, of New York.—A movement was made by the crowd to take the horses out of the carriage and to draw it themselves, but the movement was detected in time and prevented. Finally the carriage drove away, followed by many others and by an immense crowd.

Mr. Sickles was taken to the house of Mr. McBlair, next door to his former residence.

Messrs. Brady, Stewart and Savage were in the carriage that followed immediately after; in another, where Lieut. Mowry and Messrs. Stanton, Chilton and Magruder; in another, were Mr. Sickles's father, Dr. Morehead and Messrs. Wikoff and Brega, and following these were some dozen other carriages.

As the cavalcade drove along at railroad speed through the streets it was greeted with loud and enthusiastic cheers. Thousands of people were gathered in front of Mr. McBlair's house, and continued to come and go throughout the evening.

The last-named gentlemen requested the assemblage to forego their intention to serenade Mr. Sickles. He added that it was only necessary to say that Mr. Sickles wished to retire to rest undisturbed, and that he was sure this appeal would be respected.

Nine or ten of the jurors came to Mr. Brady's parlor in the "National," after all was over; and there in the freedom of unrestrained conversation expressed their real sentiments. One of them, Mr. McDermott, said—"I want you, sir, to tell the people of New York that the citizens of Washington are not behind those of any other part of the country in devotion to the family altar"—and yet this juror was spoken of all through the trial as one who would probably dissent from the rest.

The foremen, Mr. Arnold, said that his only fear had been that his health might not last him throughout the trial, and that he hoped that his latest posterity would honor his memory, from his having served on this jury. In fact the sentiments of the jury, individually expressed in his unrestrained conversation, were but a familiar and homely illustration of the opinion contained in their formal verdict of "Not Guilty."

It is said that when the jury retired one of them withdrew into a corner nud on his knees invoked Divine guidance—got up—entered into conversation—again retired to the corner—and finally rose with his mind fully made up in favor of acquittal.

Mr. Arnold, the foremnn, after an affectionate greeting with Mr. Stonton, expressed his gratification that he had lived to render such a verdict. The same juror in congratulating Mr. Sickles said that he hoped and believed the great God would acquit, as the jury had done.

The emotions of the counsel when the jury returned their verdict were manifested in various ways. Mr. Brady, in spite of all his experience as a criminal lawyer, became pale, nervous and agitated; Mr. Stanton, unable to repress the emotions of his big heart, is described as having almost rivalled David when he danced before the ark of the tabernacle; the usual stolidity of Mr. Phillips gave way, and covering his face with his hands he wept like a child. Messrs. Magruder, Ratcliffe and Clinton pressed forward and greeted their liberated client; Mr. Meagher in the exuberance of his heart, clapped people on the back, and asked if it was not "glorious." Mr. Graham was passive and undemonstrative, but was one of the first to welcome back his client to freedom; the District Attorney said "He thought it would be so," and his associate, Mr. Carlisle, avoided the scene. As to the jailor, he wept deeply, and could not understand Mr. Meagher when he condoled with him on losing his tenant.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVINING, May 10, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 7th inst.: Only a moderate amount of business has been transacted in the general market during the week which has passed since our report of Saturday last. Our leading staple, Cotton has moved off rather more freely within the past few days at the decline noticed in the early part of the week, and Sugar and Molasses have met with ready sale, the latter article at materially improved prices. In Tobacco the transactions have been comparatively limited, and the operations in Western Produce generally are on a circumscribed scale, though we notice more firmness in the prices of several articles.

On Tuesday the North Briton's accounts were received, and on Thursday, after the close of business, the Niagara's advices, three days later, came to hand, reporting a decline in the Liverpool Cotton market, for the week ended on the 22d ultimo, of 1-16 to ⅛d per pound in the Middling and lower grades, the better qualities being steady. The sales for five days summed up nearly 29,000 bales; the quotations given are 8⅛d for Fair Orleans and 7¾d for Middling ditto. The total stock at Liverpool was 432,000 bales, of which 357,000 bales were American. The advices from Manchester and other manufacturing districts were less favorable, the demand for goods having fallen off, and the markets closed dull, though prices had not yielded. At Havre the Cotton market had yielded slightly at close, and fres ordinaire was quoted at 107 francs.

The river is above the highest mark of last year, though it has fallen some during the past few days.

COTTON.—In our semi-weekly report we had occasion to notice a depressed and irregular market, with sales for the first three days of the week of about 13,500 bales, prices having fallen ¼ to ⅛c. per pound in the Middling and lower grades. On Wednesday there was rather more inquiry and sales were effected to the extent of about 6500 bales, and on Thursday there was a still more general attendance of buyers, whose offers were accepted to the extent of about 9000 bales. After the close of business on Thursday evening the Niagara's advices were received, and their tenor being of a character to check operations the market yesterday wore a very quiet appearance, the sales barely amounting to 1000 bales. Thus the sales for the past three days sum up 10,500 bales; making a total for the week of 30,000 bales. Total receipts of the week 9,400, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) are 1,622,854 bales, against 1,470,715 bales. The exports of the week to 33,085 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 6th inst. 186,028 bales. With respect to prices, we have to state that no further decline appears to have been submitted to since that noticed in our semi-weekly reports, and we have also to remark that some factors have continued to hold at rates above our quotations.

Prices are very full for the heavy, rich descriptions, which are scarce.

FLOUR.—The sales of the week reached about 12,000 barrels, at a range of $6 12½ to $6 25 for superfine, and $6 30 to $7 50 per bbl. for extra; and choice extra, $8 00.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week amount to about 19,000 sacks—the extreme figures of the sales ranging from 90 to $1 for ordinary to prime mixed, and $1 02½ to $1 05 per bushel for good to choice white. Oats sell at 63 to 64 cents per bushel, for ordinary to prime St. Louis. In Bran there have been but limited transactions at $1 70 to $1 75 per 100 lbs. Wheat, with a bare market, and no known transactions, nominally at $1 15 per bushel.

GUNNY BAGS.—Quotations are nominal at 8¾ cents for light and 10 to 11¼c. for heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair 11, good fair 11¾, and prime to choice at 11¾ to 12 cents per pound.

MONEY MARKET.—There is a perceptible increase in the amount of paper offering for discount at most of the banks, more particularly of long date acceptances, and the offerings through the discount brokers, out-doors, are larger than they were. Many parties are now making their arrangements preparatory to closing up the financial operations of the season, and the increased amount of paper offering may very properly be attributed to this cause. The supply of Money, out-doors, continues to be very ample, and good paper is in demand at rates within the range of previous quotations—say for good mortgage notes 7¾ to 8¾ per cent., first class long dated acceptances 7 to 7¾, and for second class 8 to 9 per cent. per annum.

THE VICKSBURG DEPOSITORY.

MR. EDITOR—As it may not be improper, with your permission I will pen a few thoughts for the public eye, in reference to this Depository and a few side issues.

And to begin, I will say, that we have about the best stock of books in the South, selected from the Publishing House at Nashville, and from publishers North and East, a great variety. And if there was the unanimity in the Mississippi Conference for the Depository and its work, that there seems to be in some other Conferences, we might do a vast amount of good, by the blessing of God upon our labors. Yet we are at work, and doing something. But some one, (or more it may be) is busily putting into circulation reports that are unfounded, untrue, and injurious.

One is, that we are going to fail; another, that we are bound to fail; another, that we have failed; another, that no orders can be or will be filled; another, that we do not pay annuities; another, that we will not send books unless the money accompanies the order; another, that more than one-half of those who subscribed, or gave their notes for stock, have repudiated and will not pay, and that the rest are afraid to pay; and so we are about to make a great fanfpas of the whole affair, and disgrace ourselves, the Conference, and the Church—and much more of about the same stripe.

To ease some of their apprehensions; to gratify the desire which others may have to know; to relieve others who are anxious about our success; to correct false rumor, and set ourselves right before the people among whom these reports have been circulated; to encourage our friends, and to enlist all the preachers, I submit the following statement.

Under such circumstances as have pressed upon us, we have done better than the friends of the enterprise have believed we could, in sales, etc.

We have collected $15,875 on our stock, have about $7,200 in notes and subscriptions regarded as reliable, and about $3000 set down as doubtful—not more than one-half or one-third of which may be realized; making about $23,075, stock realized, in money, and notes believed to be good; and a doubtful list of $3000. This should encourage the friends of the Depository to pay up their notes soon, at once, if they can. We hope they will.

Orders are filled with promptness and dispatch, so far as we have the books when they come. But we cannot insure that any book will be in the Depository which may be ordered by a Brother, as the orders which may arrive in one day would require every such book, if not more. Yet we are exerting ourselves to keep on hand a large and well assorted stock of books; which ranges from $10,000 to $15,000 in value. We are receiving books almost every week from the publishers at Nashville, New York, etc. We think that many would do well to send to us for books—better, if they would do their best to sell them, and get their people to read them. "My people are destroyed for the lack of knowledge," said God, by the mouth of the prophet. "Give attendance to reading," said an apostle.

None have failed to receive "annuities" who are entitled to them, except three brethren who wrote for such books as we did not have; we did not feel obliged to go out and buy books for that purpose.

The design of offering annuities was, to make so many agents of the shareholders, to put into circulation religious books and tracts; that they and their families might read them, and circulate them in their immediate neighborhoods. But somehow or other, some of them never seem to think of this when they order their annuities.

The object of the Society and Depository is, to do good by circulating religious books and tracts. These the shareholders are entitled to, as annuities; and with a little additional outlay of money, any one might obtain a supply of very good books, in a few years—a library of standard works. One year, he might take Clarke's, or Benson's, or Henry's commentaries, and pay the difference in the price. The next, he might take Watson's Dictionary and Institutes, and some tracts. One year, he might select books suitable for his children.

The annuities were designed, again, to give us so many active interested agents, who would be scattered over a large territory of country, enlisted for the success of the enterprise. What an amount of good they might do, if they would thus exert themselves! How much information on religious subjects they might bring into their families and neighborhoods!

H. H. MONTGOMERY.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

"Little Bud Kent;"

A little boy five years and a-half old, who has not yet received his name, and is called by the above pleasant nick-name—gets his 'Ma to write us a letter, in which he complains bitterly of Santa Claus.

On Christmas Eve he hung up one of his Pa's socks, and Santa Claus filled it to running over; but at the bottom of the sock he found the figure of a little crying boy!

Well, "Kent," don't be a crying boy this year, and next Christmas, perhaps, you will find a little laughing boy. When you are beginning to cry, look in the glass.

Be Kind to Your Mother.

"CHARLIE, Charlie—mother is calling you. Don't you hear her?"

"Yes; but I do n't mean to go. She is always calling me for something or other. I can't get a minute to myself."

"Why, Charlie Grenal ain't you ashamed of yourself to speak so? Mother wants you to go and rock the baby. I have got to go down to the Postoffice.

"Well, I won't rock the baby, so there now, I hate that everlasting cradle; but I'll go to the Postoffice."

"No, I am going myself. But, you bad boy, I guess you'll be sorry for this conduct if mother were to die; and she may die to-night."

"Oh, she won't!" replied Charlie, decidedly, as his sister turned to go out.

Little Johnny, who had been busily playing near the front door, heard this conversation, and his tender heart took alarm at the idea that his beloved mother might die. "I'll go and rock baby," said he, throwing down his playthings, and skipping lightly through the hall.

"Mother," he said, in his sweet, soft voice, "may I rock Walter? I'll try to do it very well, indeed."

"Thank you, my little son," replied the mother; "you are a good boy, but where is Charlie? I called for him."

"He is playing, 'ma, and don't want to come. Can't I rock the baby as well as he can?"

"You shall try, my dear, but you are hardly large enough to manage this great cradle."

But Johnny did manage it very well. His tiny hands worked hard to keep the cradle from slipping out of its place; and he made it jog, jog, jog, so steadily that the mother was very much pleased. She took her dear little Johnny upon her lap, and kissed him ever so many times, calling him her "comfort," and telling him that he would certainly be a man if he lived to grow up.

Johnny was very happy; and when he had leave to run out to play, his heart felt so light that he found it impossible to keep his feet upon the ground, but went leaping and skipping along at an astonishing rate.

But the naughty and selfish Charlie had passed a most uncomfortable forenoon. He knew it was very wicked for him to do as he had done; and then his little brother's different behavior had made him feel ashamed of himself. He had roved about the garden and through the fields, seeking pleasure, but had found very little. As is usual with persons in his state of mind, he had done several unkind actions. Ill at ease with himself, he had "spit out his spite" on all that chanced to come in his way—had stoned the poor kitten and chickens, had hurt the good dog Don, and had given the tail of the horse a twitch, which caused the old fellow to kick violently. If his heels had hit Master Charlie's head, he would never have done any more mischief.

When the bell rang for dinner, the uneasy boy went slowly toward the house. He would not have gone, had he not felt very hungry. He walked right into the dining-room and was going to take his place at the table without washing his face or hands, or brushing his thick curly hair.

"Charlie, my son, I am astonished that you should show yourself at table in that plight. Go and wash yourself," said his mother, mildly. She had not heard his naughty words in the morning, and had forgotten that he did not come when called.

"Oh, dear!" said Charlie, crossly kicking back his chair and rushing out of the room. He acted as naughtily as he dared all dinner time. He was a very bad, troublesome boy all the afternoon, and when he went to bed that night, he did so without kissing his mother, good-by, or saying his prayers—and a whole, long, miserable day he had passed, just in consequence of his bad conduct in the morning.

That was a day he never forgot, and one which gave him deep pain to remember, to the latest day of his life.

When he awoke the next morning, it was to hear that his mother, whom, notwithstanding his undutiful behavior, he dearly loved—that dear, kind mother, whose cheek he had the night before refused to kiss, had died in the night. Yes, in a moment her heart stopped beating, and she had gone from her children forever.

Oh! how sorry was Charlie that he had not minded her, and been a good boy upon the last day of her precious life. But it was too late now—all the poor lad's tears and remorse availed nothing—his mother could not speak to him and tell him he was forgiven. He knew that he should never again listen to her dear, loving voice, or meet the glance of her soft, mild eye—his mother was dead, dead—and he had been naughty to her the very last time he had seen her in life.

My little children, whose place had you rather stand in when your mother dies, the place of Charlie or Johnny? O, how very thoughtless little boys, and girls too, are, in the treatment of their dear, dear mothers. If they only could realize, as they do who are motherless, what a dreadful thing it is to have a mother die, they certainly would try to be more dutiful, respectful and affectionate, to that best and most tender of all human kindred.

Obey your mother my children—be always kind to her; that you may not have bitter remorse to sting you when you can see her no more.

Beauty of Woman.

Is there not a beauty and a charm in that venerable and reverend woman who sits in the "majesty of age" beside the fireside of her son: She, who nursed him in his infancy, tended him in youth, counselled in manhood, and who now dwells as the tutelary goddess of his household?

What a host of blessed memories are linked with that mother, even in her reverential and arm-chair days!—what a multitude of sanctifying associations surround her, and make her lovely, even on the verge of the grave!

Is there not a charm and beauty in that matronly woman who sits looking fondly on the child in her lap? Is there not a holy influence around her, and does not the observer at once pronounce her lovely? What though the lines and lineaments of youth be fled? Time has given far more than he has taken away.

Is there not a beauty and a charm in a fair girl who is blushing before that matron, her own womanly sympathies just opening into active life, as she folds that youthful infant to her bosom?

All are beautiful—the opening blossoms, the mature flower, and the ripened fruit; and the callous heart and unnatural mind, that gropes for loveliness as a stimulant for passion, only shows that it has no correct sense of beauty or refined taste.

A Few Words of Advice to Young Men.

Never smoke cigars when you have not money to pay for smoking your cost. Worn-out button-holes look badly in brilliant lights or even by paler fires.

Never smoke cigars when you are too poor to pay honest debts.

Never be too poor to pay for a seat in Church, while you can spend eight times as much for an indulgence that is not only no benefit to body or mind, but a real detriment to both.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee!"

EDDIE.

O'er the green woodland, in joyous play,
My sweet little Eddie is hasting away.
His silky light hair in the sunlight is streaming,
And from his bright eyes his pure spirit is beaming.

His innocent bosom ne'er knows any sadness,
Save transient light woes, which anon turn to gladness.
He loves the bright hues of the butterfly's wing,
And stops in his flight, when the wood-minstrels sing.

Bright birds are his play-mates; he dwells with sweet flowers;
With these gentle companions he spends his glad hours.
When the sky's tinged with purple, before the sun's down,
His clear silvery laugh breaks forth on the lawn.

And when weary Phœbus retires to rest,
His gentle soul dreams on a fond mother, breast.
Thus, when from his bright form his spirit shall sever,
O'is the breast of the Savior may he lean forever.

WHAT IS THE FAMILY?

It is a little EMPIRE. The father is the sovereign. It is an absolute sovereignty, constituted in wisdom and restrained by affection. It is derived from the fountain of all power. With this authority is connected immense responsibility. No substitute can be found. To the government thus constituted, unreserved obedience is required, that its ends may be fully answered. It is a type of that ultimate submission, which will be paid to the Father of all by his redeemed family in heaven. Then cometh the end when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father."

The family is a NURSERY. The idea is derived from a materiel process in nature to which both animals and plants are subjected. God speaks of planting a "noble vine." Such is the family. It requires nourishing, protecting, maturing, as much as the literal vine. "Christian families are the nurseries of the church on earth, as the church is the nursery for heaven." The nursery is a retired place, but pregnant with preparations for eternity. Its germinations are immortal. It is the birth-place of body and mind. Happy, when some auspicious star of hope hovers over it. A train of associations is there commenced, which is imperishable; habitudes into which the very soul is molded; impressions are engraven, which no lapse of time shall ever obliterate; which eternity itself will but confirm and perpetuate. Like seed, like harvest: "He that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." A mental philosopher has said, that the character is formed before the expiration of the sixth year of our existence. And those years are in the hand of the mother! The mother of Byron would become frantic with passion, and throw the tongs at him, in early childhood. Hence he became more and more ungovernable; in fact, never knew what self-government was, for he was never taught it. He had no home. Not so Cowper, who embalms, in fascinating poetry, his recollections of the sanctity of home. The reminiscences of his mother were so delightful, he could apostrophize in tender numbers even her portrait, when brought to view.

The family is a SCHOOL. The parent is the natural teacher. With what beauty of language and solemnity of style, with what divine authority does the law-giver of Israel appoint the parent to this work—Deut. vi. 7. In the house, by the way, in the morning, in the evening, must this work be constantly done. Happy the child who can say: "I was my father's son—taught me also." Happy the parent who saith: "Hear ye, children, the instructions of a father." Speak not of wealth, of legacies, of estates bequeathed. The best inheritance is the education of the soul for eternity. Alas! how many thousands are trained to a career of guilt and shame.

The family is a SOCIETY. In it are all the elements of the social relations. Numbers, intellect, attachments, sympathies, temperaments, attrition of mind, moral power. Thus it is the very foundation of civil society, whose dignity, advancement, and prosperity, in every form, depend upon the same qualities in the family. This is the only road to the perfection of the social state.

The family is a SANCTUARY. If on earth can be found a refuge from earth's ills, toils, and calamities, it is here. To the man of business, jaded with cares; to the laborer, worn with toil; to the professional man, the clerk, the politician; to the sailor, from the stormy wave; to the soldier, from the bloody fight; to all who come from the battle of life, how refreshing to find one spot where the heart is sure to repose, undisturbed by a doubt that there every face beams with a smile of welcome, every heart bounds with joyful emotion.

The well-ordered family is a little CHURCH. Believers and their children in covenant with God, constitute the essential idea of a church—at least in a qualified sense. Such a family is the miniature of the "whole family named in heaven." "To the church in thy house," said Paul to Philemon. Happy house! Thrice blessed home! God is their father, Christ their elder brother, the Holy Spirit their sanctifier and guide. That house is the vestibule of heaven. The sacred shrine is there. There the incense of prayer diffuses its sweetness. The melody of praise is there. Death does not break, but sanctifies the link, which binds it to the family above. The grave but opens the passage to glory!—[N. Y. Observer.

ORIGIN OF THE NAMES OF STATES.

Maine was first called "Marvoosheu," but about 1638, took the name it now bears from Maine, a province in the western part of France. The name is originally derived from the Cenomanni, an ancient Gallic people. New Hampshire was the name given to the territory granted by the Plymouth Company of Capt. John Mason, by patent, in 1639, and was derived from the patentee, who was governor of Portsmouth, in Hampshire, England. Vermont is from verb, green, and mont, mountain. Massachusetts was named from a tribe of Indians in the vicinity of Boston. Roger Williams says, the word signifies "blue hills." Rhode Island was so called in 1644 in relation to the island of Rhodes in the Mediterranean. New York was named in honour of the Duke of York, to whom this territory was granted. Pennsylvania was called after William Penn. In 1664 the Duke of York made a grant of what is now the state of New Jersey to Lord Berkley and Sir George Carteret, and it received its name in compliment to the latter, who had been governor of the Island of Jersey. Delaware was so called in 1702, after Lord De La-Ware. Maryland was named in honour of Henrietta Maria, queen of Charles I., in his patent to Lord Baltimore, June 3, 1632. Virginia was called after the virgin queen of England, Elizabeth. The Carolinas were named by the French in honor of Charles IX. of France. Georgia was called, in 1692, after George II. Louisiana was named after Louis XIV. of France. Florida received its name from Ponce de Leon, in 1512, while on his voyage in search of the fountain of youth. He discovered it on Easter Sunday—in Spanish, Pasque Florida. The states of Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Arkansas and Missouri, are all named from their principal rivers, and the names of Indian origin—excepting, perhaps, Kentucky—and their meanings involved in some obscurity. Tennessee is said to signify a curved spoon; Illinois, the river of men; Mississippi, the whole river, or a river formed by the union of many. Michigan was named from the lake on its borders. Iowa is an Indian name; also Texas—signifying "beautiful." California was thus named by the Spaniards at a very early day.

HOW TO COOL WATER.

If it is desired to cool water for drinking in warm weather, and ice cannot be had for the purpose, let it be kept in an unglazed earthenware pitcher, wrapt around with two or three folds of coarse cotton cloth kept constantly wet. The theory of cooling water in this manner is the absorption of heat from it by the evaporation of the moisture in the cotton cloth—expansion produces cold, compression heat.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. ELIZABETH THOMPSON died April 25th, 1859, in Fayette county, Ala., at the residence of Mr. T. Musgrova, after a long and severe illness, occasioned by a fall. Mother T. was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Weaver, and was born near Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Sept. 27th, 1776; emigrated to Virginia; and from thence to Jefferson county Tennessee, where, at the age of twenty, she married Mr. Nathan Thompson, with whom she lived till his death, about eighteen years ago. They moved to Hawkins county, lived there several years, then came to Fayette county, where she spent nearly forty years of her life. About thirty years ago she was converted, at a camp-meeting held by the Cumberland Presbyterians; and became a member of the Church. She was a consistent Christian, faithful wife, an affectionate mother, and a sincere friend. Her confidence in the sufficiency of God's grace to support the afflicted was strong, and gave evidence that God was strengthening her soul upon the bed of languishing. When the last moments came, she repeated the verse, commencing—

"Jesus can make a dying bed," etc.

The soul then left its clay tenement for a better habitation. A large number of children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren, and friends, weep her loss—not without the hope of meeting "Grandmother Thompson" where parting is no more. D. S. M.

WILLIAM N., youngest son of Philip and Mary Myers, died at the residence of his father in Hinds county, Miss., on the 19th ult., in the 24th year of his age. With a well cultivated mind, an amiable disposition, he was rich in friends; and held the esteem of all classes of society; yet he has gone down to the dark valley, ere he had passed the first stage of manhood.

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

Young Mr. M. always exhibited a very great attachment to his relations and friends; but, if possible, for two or three months prior to his death, his devotion to them increased, especially to his honored parents; within which space he appeared to have no disposition to leave home or do anything but cultivate that warm and tender filial affection for which he was distinguished among his fellows and loved at home. A FRIEND.

MISS JEANNETTE GRIFFON, pupil of Bossier Academy, and daughter of M. E. and Berry F. Bruton, died 27th March, 1859, aged 10 years, at the residence of Mr. John G. Platt in Bossier parish, La. Though not of a strong constitution, few of her age had more of that kind of nerve that the moral sense stimulates. Her parents early instilled into her mind Christian precepts, and in their daily living she saw them exemplified. Jennie felt an abiding sense of duty, and cherished an affectionate regard for all around her. Though deprived of the presence of her fond parents during her fatal sickness, she was surrounded by the kind administrations of fond friends. Her lithe form, elastic step, lithe manner, and kind affections are all now shrouded in the silence of the grave. Alas! Little Jennie is gone!—gone, forever, from the embrace of earthly friends—from the endeared associations of home. Gone to a more congenial clime—a better home. Gone, to join the company of the blessed. K. H.

ROBERT ARMISTEAD, son of R. C. and Engenie Armistead, in his 6th year, died March 3d, 1858, of membranous croup. What fond hopes and anticipations the parents had for the future of their child—how joyfully they looked forward to the time when their noble boy would become a noble man; but how vain are all their hopes, for he is gone—and gone forever. That sweet voice is stilled, and those bright eyes are closed in death. He was a patient little sufferer; no word of complaint escaped him; but quietly and calmly he lay upon that couch of pain; and when Jesus called him, he gave each of the loved ones a parting kiss, and went pure and sinless to Jesus' arms. MRS. HENRIETTA NICKS, aged 31, a native of Natchez, died in that city, of consumption, after a protracted illness, on Wednesday, the 30th ult. In the year 1845 she united with the Methodist Episcopal Church; since when, her life has been strictly that of a Christian, and in the service of God. To know her was to love her. An affectionate, dutiful wife, and a loving mother. She died in the triumph of faith. When she felt she was passing through the dark valley, she exclaimed, "How very precious is my Savior. R.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility, Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc, etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstruation, Cholcris or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure wait confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUBJECT.—A girl of 15 or 16 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep-seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more pores under the ear. The entire lymphatics system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no Panacea, nor Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, an secret, but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, todkin of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar in the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. J. R. HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov. 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure, though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold. Very respectfully yours,

C. E. STEVENS.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vessy, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to thrice in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity.
Respectfully, J. W. VESSY.

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESSY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am indeed to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 18 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician. On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two inches to half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursling infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little cre

Delay for men and means—Contingent liberality of the East—The Parting—A New Recruit in Old-fashioned Itinerancy—The Land and the Sea—From "Sunshine" Westward—A fine Hotel—A liberal Californian—A premature "settlement"—A delightful week—New Orleans, and its characteristics—Duty of the Church.

MR. EDITOR:—In answer to your earnest petition for "letters" from me, on my way to California, I begin to-day; proposing to continue more or less regularly, as circumstances will allow.

My departure has been delayed a month or two by my efforts to obtain preachers and money for the Pacific Conference, as ordered by the General Conference. One transfer from Texas has gone in advance. I have with me three young men—one from Georgia, one from East Tennessee, one from Arkansas. Several preachers have offered to go, but in most instances they have belonged to Conferences too weak to spare, without detriment, any of their number. The collections have been liberal, all things considered, and in relation both to men and means, I think the Eastern Conferences declined to sympathy and action—and that they will co-operate cheerfully, if assured that our organization in California ought to be maintained. In due time I shall give the church my impressions on this subject.

Long accustomed to leave home and friends for days and weeks and months together, I thought I had schooled my heart to such control as to be master of myself and my sensibilities. But California is a long way from Georgia—there are perils by land and water—letters, uncertain in their transit and of old date on their reception, mocking you with ancient history when you are longing for news. And now before I start, for days the children look sad; unbidden tears well up in their eyes, and all the household move about as if a calamity had fallen or was coming—plans for the year must be made, one child sent here another there, directions given although I was writing my last will and testament, and finally the farewell morning comes—the adieu is spoken amid convulsive sobs and long lingering embraces. Say that we will, strong in faith, resolved on duty as we may see he, such a time is a trial. Never wavering, delaying not a moment beyond the appointed time—so I felt and feel it still. True, Mrs. P. and our youngest daughter bear me company, but this rather adds to than diminishes my solicitude. This companionship lessens the anxieties of travel and takes away the feeling of security about home interests. On all former occasions I left home satisfied that the good sense and excellent management of my "better half," would conserve our interests there; now I go "down to the war" and leave "the staff" to inexperienced hands. In a long itinerant life my wife has never accompanied me before, and I suspect will locate at the end of the present year, for she is delighted with the trip. Railroads and good steamboats are pleasant modes of conveyance, especially as they bear you from town to town—city to city, amid old friends and acquaintances; but she will see "the elephant" before we reach California. Twenty hundred miles of stage travel, mainly through a wilderness—not to say a desert—is old fashioned itinerancy. What! are you going the land route?" has been said to me in wonder, a hundred times. Yes, I answer; for several reasons I do not like to travel on water; it is tedious, monotonous, wearisome; sea-sickness is horrid, revolting, (believe me.) Let others poetize about "the deep, deep blue sea," my imagination is more at home amid plains and mountains. Talk of breeze and billow—I like the first when it blows on land, and the other when it rolls, and leaves me stationary. The fact is, an old Phœnician galley, propelled by oars along the coast, suits me better than your modern steamer, with all her appliances for destruction. I was born in the country—raised in the country—live in the country now—love it; feel at home amid fields and woods, and do not like to lose sight of them. I go by land, because I wish to see the far West in its wildness. I like adventure (upon land); have no fear of toil and fatigue; and expect to make the trip subserve my ministry—the cause of missions and the extension of the Church, South. Last but not least, Mr. Giddings, the mail contractor, voluntarily and kindly offered me a free passage for myself and wife, with every assurance of safety and comfort the route allows. Withal, the brethren in California urged me to come this way, alleging that I could better serve the Conference by entering the State far from San Francisco and working at points not likely to be visited on any other plan. But enough, for preliminaries.

We left "Sunshine" in tears on the 7th inst., spent a night at Madison with my brother and his family, and left for Columbus, to see my father and sisters, residing there. Preached twice on Sabbath—took a respectable collection for the the Church in San Francisco—passed the bitter ordeal of parting with friends again, and left for Monigomery. My old friend, Dr. Dawson, with his wife, took passage with us. I had hoped to preach at night and "beg," but the boat for Mobile left at 5 P. M., and we were constrained to depart. Montgomery is on my list (if need be) when I return. At Selma, "the Czar," rounded too emly in the morning, and as she was taking on cotton I was taken off, and pressed to preach. I yielded, and held forth to a congregation hastily gathered, and whether the church was edified or not, I cannot tell, but the truth was power and joy to me. We reached Mobile in the night, and rather than disturb our friends at an unseasonable hour, we went to the Battle House, the best hotel in the South. I have seen none equel to it any where. Crowded with people, it is nevertheless quiet as a private dwelling; servants prompt and polite—rooms airy and clean—table loaded with the luxuries of land and sea, and all the appointments of the house are of the first class. None who stop there will go away disappointed. The Sabbath was appropriated to preaching and collections as usual. The preaching was not great, and the collection was not heavy but respectable. On Monday afternoon, as we were leaving, a gentleman who had been to California, handed me a hundred dollars, to be used at my discretion. This addition helped the collection smartly, and will be used according to the discretionary instructions of the donor.

This boat-traveling from Mobile to the Crescent City is refreshing. A noble craft—a quiet lake—delightful company—the present trip was an enjoyment to be remembered. "Remembered joys are never past," saith Montgomery. So then I shall have one thread of light in the web of the future. When we reached the wharf and took our seats in the cars, we expected soon to reach the city—four miles distant. But we moved slowly—more slowly yet, and then stood still; the engine had hopelessly failed. We considered ourselves settled for a season. It was early morn—we had the day before us, and could afford to wait. We did not wait long. Engines may fail—telegraph wires may break—steamboats may explode, but tidings of misfortune never lack for carriers. The news will spread, especially if the victim can pay. In a twinkling almost we heard the ring of rapid hoofs and the roar of revolving wheels, and presently the din of tongues—"Have a carriage, sir? carry you any where in the city." Hack drivers, I suppose, are a public convenience, but they are a nuisance too. We were rescued from their annoyance by my good brother Gillespie, who came out to take us to his hospitable house. I have rarely seen a Methodist preacher whose heart was not bigger than his habitation, but G.'s house and heart are both elastic—can stretch without straining, and so rejecting all remonstrance to the contrary, he took us all captive and away we went. Dr. Dawson and wife, (I despise that word "Lady," in this connection,) myself, wife and daughter, and found ourselves at home. The week spent here was one of unmingled pleasure. Renewed intercourse with chosen friends—new acquaintances—letters from home—access to all the church papers—consultations with experienced brethren on the enterprises of Southern Methodism—the privilege of preaching several times—the prompt response of the people to my call for aid, all served to beguile time of its weariness and make me hopeful and happy. Nevertheless, as I wandered about, and looked upon the throng of the busy and the gay—sad, depressing thoughts would intrude. How few among these thousands "fear God and keep His commandments!" What temptations to earthliness, sensuality and sin, abound! Here amusement spreads her snares and plies her charms by night and day, catering alike to the vulgar and the refined, full of invention, fraud and trick. Business condensed into a few months, demands the time, thought, care, of all who prefer gold to pleasure. Buy, sell, get gain, make haste, get away, the yellow fever comes; so life is concentrated—the pressure is too strong to be resisted, and thus eternity is lost in time. After all, I see not that New Orleans is more wicked than other great cities. True, the desecration of the Sabbath is alarming—afflictive; but the explanation is to be found, not in the depravity of the American population, but in the foreign elements assembled here; in the Jews, who have a Sabbath of their own, and in the godless latitude allowed by the Catholic religion. I believe the municipal authorities here, as elsewhere, err egregiously in yielding to the demands of "the lawless and abominable," who, under false views of religious toleration and civil liberty, are pleading exemption from wholesome restraints, and seeking to flood the land with a licentious infidelity. This is a Christian—a Protestant country—and while toleration in religion is the guarantee of the Constitution, and is supported by the sentiment of the people, no man nor community of men can plead "conscience" for outraging public morality. The doctrine of "rights" is destined to revision—the time is at hand—the necessity is upon us, and when the work is done and the truth established, it will be found that the Bible is the law, and that nobody has the natural "right" to do moral wrong.

In the mean time, let the Protestant Churches be faithful to their high calling. Multiply churches, Sunday-schools—establish Missions—circulate Tracts—preach in the market-places—carry the Gospel to the outcast and neglected. Our large cities are mission-fields, demanding more men and money than have ever been appropriated to them.

We shall likely reach Shreveport to-night. Our boat stops at every landing, and we "make haste, slowly."

G. F. PIERCE.

THE HERE AND THERE OF A BIBLE AGENT.

Columbiana—A Priest—A Converted Irishman—Shelby County—Home of L. B. McDonald—Montevallo—A Needy Place—Selma—A Crank-sided Rail-road—Union-town—A New Church—Horse-back in the "Black" Lands"—Dayton—A Methodist Preacher up a Tree.

MR. EDITOR—I addressed you last from Summerfield; but let me resume our peregriuations, and touch at other points.

From Summerfield I went up, in the Selma and Tennessee Railroad, to Columbiana, in Shelby county. Here I met the Rev. John W. Starr, P. E. of the Summerfield District. He had preceded me to this place, and made an appointment for me, indeed warmly invited me to labor in his field. It is pleasant to meet with the ministers of Christ under any circumstances, but the more so, when I see in them the disposition to honor the great cause which I represent. It is gratifying to be able to say, that thus far I have received from them a cordial welcome into their fields of labor, and had their hearty co-operation in the efforts I have made to circulate the scriptures.

A very respectable contribution was made to the Bible cause in Columbiana. Here they have a County Bible Society, which for efficiency is excelled by but few. It has sent out the healing leaves of truth to scores of sin-sick souls. Into many an humble dwelling, where the night of ignorance and guilt held sway over redeemed immortal spirits, it has carried this lamp of life. It has almost supplied the destitute of that region, and is still at work. In conversation with one of its colporteurs, I was told that some of the Irishmen, working on the rail-road near the town of Columbiana had been supplied with copies of the Bible, but that when his honor the priest paid them his visit, to gather up their hard-earned dimes, he commanded them to commit their Bibles to the flames. This was in keeping with Romish barbarity; but may God grant that the truths, which were likely lodged in their minds before that priestly visit, may lead these souls from the oppressor's rod to the sceptre of the Prince of Peace!

One aged son of Erin received the book of God from this same colporteur, and carried it to his humble shanty, and read it until it broke his chains, scattered his darkness, and brought him into the liberty of the sons of God. "About a month after I gave him the Bible," says this colporteur, "I met him in the road. He smiled when he saw me, and said God had converted his soul; and we had a happy meeting together in the public road."

This portion of Shelby has some good grain lands, and now and then there are farms which yield from eight to ten hundred pounds of cotton per acre. Provisions are raised in great abundance there; and I think few sections of Alabama are more inviting to one who has not the cotton-and negro-mania,—and will be contented with good neighbors, good water, and a plenty of wholesome food.

Brother Brown, the stational preacher of the M. E. Church at Columbiana, and I, had a pleasant horse-back ride three miles into the country, to see the residence of Rev. L. B. McDonald, once of the Alabama Conference, and Presiding Elder of the Talladega District. The farm is a beautiful one, but it had passed into other hands, its former owner having migrated to a better country—the heavenly.

From Columbiana, in company with Bro. Starr, I came down to Montevallo, and held a Bible meeting on the night of the 11th March. Found here some warm friends of the cause, and some who I fear, if they ever had any love for it, have suffered it to languish and perhaps die. They have here a Bible Society, which has accomplished much good; and it may be added, that it is out of debt, with books on hand for distribution.

Friday, 12th, took the cars and came down to Randolph, in company with the Presiding Elder and Rev. Bro. Brandon. At night took up a collection, or tried; got a little, which is to be returned in Bibles. When these are read, and another call made upon them, they will no doubt enlarge their subscription. The people of this region need gospel light, and those persons blessed of God with the ability to send it, should do it speedily.

On Sabbath night, 13th, we had quite an interesting Bible meeting at Selma, in the Rev. Mr. Porter's church (Presbyterian). The Rev. Mr. Ransom, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and Mr. Byrd, a lawyer of that city and a worthy and influential member of the M. E. Church, made capital addresses, and I followed with a begging talk. What a pity that the word begging has to be used in connection with the Bible cause; what a comment upon man's insensibility to his obligations to God and man, what an evidence of the heart's enslavement to that great sin which the scriptures call Covetousness and Idolatry! When will the Church learn to appreciate the worth of souls, and consider it a greater honor to save souls than to make money?

I had a pleasant time in Selma, with Dr. Wadsworth, the pastor of the Methodist church. I was frequently at his house, where I felt quite at home amid the kind attentions of himself and wife. The Dr. I have known long, as a faithful and able minister of Christ. His church fully appreciates his peculiar qualifications as an expounder of the Holy Scriptures.

From Selma I took the cars to Woodville, or to Uniontown, as it is often called. Of all the railroads I ever rode on, this is the most uninviting, because the most uneven and crank-sided; and yet, I am told, that over 40,000 bags of cotton have been transported over it to Selma the past winter. They who ride over it have many ups and downs. Our cow-catcher instead of doing its legitimate work, went driving into the road, and so impeded our progress, that we had to get out and knock it off. Relieved of this offence, we proceeded, glad to make progress in any way. Any person having dyspepsia would do well to take a ticket on this road during the rainy season. I have heard that we should not abuse the bridge that takes us over safely; just so, we should deal with all vehicles, etc., which carry us where we want to go. It is difficult to keep up a railroad through this rich cane-brake country. The soil, when saturated with water, becomes soft, and yields to the weight of the cars. In the face however of every disadvantage, the managers of this road are sending it Westward for a connection with some Mississippi road.

At Uniontown I met with the Rev. Josiah Bancroft, stationed preacher of the M. E. Church in that place. We had a Bible meeting in the Presbyterian church, and made him and the pastor of said church, Rev. Mr. McCauley, Life Members of the American Bible Society. Our collection here was a good one.

The Methodists here are just completing one of the neatest church-edifices in the State. It will cost about twelve thousand dollars, and will be an ornament to the town, and an honor to those who have contributed towards its erection.

After preaching Sabbath morning, and lecturing to the Sabbath-school in Uniontown, I hired a horse and rode to Dayton, thirteen miles. Mr. Editor, did you ever attempt to travel through that section of Alabama during an exceedingly rainy winter? If you have not, you can form no conception of the difficulty of doing so. You have heard of the man who had a wagon-load of pumpkins, who, when going up a hill, saw his hind gate break loose and his pumpkins go rolling down the hill; he stopped to abuse things in general, but suddenly checked himself, saying, "I'll quit, for I can't do justice to the subject." So with these cane-brake roads in the winter; you cannot do them justice in the way of description.

In Dayton, I found Bro. Barker, P. E. of Demopolis, District, living in the parsonage with Bro. Ellis, the Station preacher. Bro. Ellis is much beloved by his people and promises to be very useful. Bro. Barker has had his share of water and mud during the past winter. He told me that he had been swimming creeks and sloughs, until he had become reconstomed to it, and rather liked it. I hope he won't get to love water so much as to go to the Baptists. Indeed Theophilus Walton has had a wet time of it close by him. It is well to look after both of them.

Bro. Barker gave me the following account of Bro. L. M. Wilson's adventure soon after going to his Circuit:

"Rev. L. M. Wilson, preacher on Springhill Circuit, Demopolis District, one Saturday night in January last, left Linden on his way to Jefferson, about dusk, and just about dark arrived at a slough on Chickasabouge swamp. Seeing a flood of water before him, and unacquainted with the way, he determined to proceed cautiously, and if he found the water very deep, return and spend the night in Linden. Suddenly he found his horse swimming, and being "so far in," determined, if possible, to go over. He soon, however, reached a current, which bore him down into driftwood and logs, where he by some means became separated from his horse; and finding a tree convenient, he climbed it and called for help. After a while, a negro boy came to the verge of the flood, waving his torch, and held a conversation with this man up a tree. Wilson, telling him who he was, begged him to go back to Linden (one and a half miles) and get help to rescue him. This negro made fair promises, but went away, and was heard of no more.

"About an hour before day, Wilson, finding himself chilled and drowsy, made a desperate effort and swam to land, leaving his overcoat and saddle-bags in the tree. Ever since that time he complains of severe pain in his side. His health may be seriously injured."

Now we part at Dayton. Here are some clever people, who kindly entertained me as the agent of the Bible cause in Alabama. Let me not forget to mention that one of the best parsonages in the Alabama Conference is here, and was purchased and given to the church by two brethren, Terrell and Reeves. C. D. OLIVER,

PULPIT ODDITIES.

Whang-doodle—Rising Gorge—Pulling a Preachers Nose—Metacarpal phalanges—Clerical Assault and Battery—Fire in the Rear—Heavenly Slang.

BY YOUR LEAVE, Mr. Editor, I propose to call attention to a few peculiarities of the Clergy, coming under the above caption.

There are many preachers who seem to think a natural tone of voice and expression of countenance, incompatible with a becoming pulpit solemnity and dignity. Hence, they resort to elongations and lugubrious expressions of face, nasal tones and final twangs; and sometimes to a rising or falling of the voice, in doleful cadence, after a regular "whang-doodle" order—ah. Sometimes one is reminded by the speaker's expression and manner, of a person troubled with a "rising gorge"—nausea. There are others who make peculiar use of the hand while preaching. One, for instance, pulled at the end of his nose occasionally, as if ideas were to come out of that organ; another starts out with his hand thrust into the pantaloons pocket, or frequently hides it behind his back, as if he did not wish it to be seen; another arouses our inquisitive faculties by nearly always starting off with a small paper wound between thumb and hand; while still another, of the Jupiter Tonans order, as if in want of a thunderbolt, doubles up his metacarpal phalanges into a kind of club, and comes down with a vim, upon pulpit board or Bible. Not long since I heard of a good brother, who while preaching, essayed to make an impressive gesture, Bible in hand, when lo! the Bible slipped from his grasp, and away it flew towards an astonished auditor. Apropos—we have a new Bible in our church, and when one of those sons of thunder comes along we would have him expound—not pound our new Bible.

One good brother, whom to know is to love, is wont to set our risibilities going by turning round occasionally in the midst of an earnest appeal, and preaching right at the clerical brother who sits in the pulpit behind him, while the major part of his congregation is left with only a rear view, or at least, only an oblique view of his front piece.

There are few preachers who have not some stereotyped or pet phrases, which occur in sermons or prayer, frequently beyond all commendation. Heaven, for instance, is called the "Glory-land;" the gospel, is called "the glorious gospel of the blessed God;" and the kingdom of heaven, "the kingdom of our Lord and, Savior Jesus Christ." Now such phrases are altogether right in themselves, and we do not object to them; it is to their unnecessarily frequent recurrence in the same sermon or by the same preacher, that we object. Sometimes the word of God, is called the "Sacred Scriptures of Divine Truth"—a long tautological phrase. Would the Bible, or the Scriptures answer as well? There are also set phrases, with which many persons, preachers and others as well, almost invariably "wind up" their prayers, as "guide and direct us," "sustain and support us," and the like. We heartily join in these petitions, but object to their tautological construction. What does guide mean but to direct? And what does direct mean but to guide? So, also, support and sustain define each other. Why not as well say, then, "guide and guide us," "support and support us," etc.? But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions as the heathen do. Your friend from the interior. RUSTICUS AMICUS.

A REMINISCENCE—UNCLE SAM.

A Sweet Family—A Sweet Evening—A Black Prayer-meeting—Glory versus Amen—Uncle Sam's Farewell.

IT WAS the summer of of 1837, in the month of August, after a day of excessive toil and a long ride through the hot sun, I arrived at the hospitable dwelling of my warm-hearted friends, Brother and Sister H——, where the preachers always received a hearty welcome, and every attention that kindness could invent. O! how sweet is the memory of those kind friends that have cheered and comforted us on the weary way of life's toils and sufferings!

Everything was lovely and sweet in that family. We had an early supper, and sweet communion with God and each other around the family altar. That altar was always kept in order, and the sacrifice duly offered up morning and evening; and there was peace and harmony in that family, for God had "made his abods with them." I found comfortable quarters in a room from which a window opened to the North, in which direction stood a comfortable negro cabin some forty paces distant. All nature was soon hushed into quiet, and nought was to be heard except the merry chattering of the katy-did, which could now venture to utter forth its music without fear of being espied and devoured by some vigilant member of the feathered tribe. Everything seemed to invite "sleep, the sweet restorer of tired nature;" and yet, such was the state of my nerves, that sleep would not come.

After an hour, perhaps, my ears were saluted with the sound of a sweet song. I listened; and another and another voice chimed in. And O, how heavenly and sweet was that music, as several clear, strong, melodious voices were pealed forth upon the soft balmy breezes of that calm summer evening, in the use of that good old hymn, beginning "Come, ye that love the Lord," etc.! The hymn closed, and the prayer began. I became more interested, until I could remain in bed no longer, I went to the window and listened, and my spirit joined with that praying circle, though I saw them not. The prayer was particularly marked for its fervency; the language was somewhat broken, sufficiently so, to show that it proceeded from the lips of a son of Ham, but then its fervency and deep spirituality showed, equally clearly, that it came from a Christian heart, and that that heart was in solemn audience with God. After a prayer of ordinary length, it seemed to be drawing to a close, after embracing in its ample scope, master and mistress and all the children; and, especially, our preacher, who leaves wife and children all behind, "to preach the gospel to us poor sinners, that we all might come to Christ and be saved." And then for the spread of the gospel and the salvation of the world, he said with a full heart, "and then take us all home to heaven, where parents and children, wife and husband, master and servant, all meet to part no more."

Just there, the cup ran over with "glory to God and the Lamb, forever!" and the pious old wife shouted, and the children sobbed audibly; and the good old man went back and commenced again to close up his prayer, and I think three or four different times he came up to the idea of all meeting in heaven where sorrow never comes, before he could get amen to come; it would come out "glory!" instead of amen. He closed, however, at length, and I returned to bed with the firm conviction, that God lived in the cabin of the servant as well as in the house of his master.

Next morning I inquired, and found that the praying men was called Uncle Sam, a servant who had lived with Bro. H—— from his marriage, had always been a faithful servant, and for many years a holy Christian; that he kept up family prayer as regularly as any Bishop; had raised a large family of children, always had them all together at prayer night and morning, and took great pains to "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." Uncle Sam loved class meetings, was always there, and God often blessed him and his pious class-leader together, as he still lives to testify.

One Sabbath, however, at length, his leader found Uncle Sam's seat vacant, and he knew something serious was the matter. He called to see him, and found him very ill; but happy in God, and just waiting for his change. His physician, who was a pious man, told me Uncle Sam's was the most remarkable case he ever knew. Said he—"I can't get him to think about his sickness at all. He thinks of Jesus and talks of heaven all the time. O!" said he, "I wish that I had known long ago that there was such a man in the neighborhood. I have no doubt I should have derived great benefit from his godly conversation."

On Sunday morning, just about the time of day that Uncle Sam usually set out for class-meeting, happy in God, without a cloud to intervene between his soul and his Savior, in the presence of his master and mistress and the family, his class-leader, and other weeping friends, Uncle Sam bid them all farewell; saying "I am going up to join in that grand class-meeting above, which will never break up"—and his spirit left the clay in a blaze of heavenly glory. A CHRIST-LIKE SENTIMENT.—Rev. Dr. Johns, an Episcopal clergyman in Baltimore, says of excessive denominationalism: "Wherever this goes beyond love for souls, something is wrong. So fearful am I of this spirit, that I have been accustomed for years, in passing a house of worship, of some other denomination than my own, to lift my heart to God in prayer for that minister and his people."

PREMONITION—A TALE OF THE SOUTH.

IN THE YEAR 1820, when the present State of Alabama was a comparative wilderness, a gentleman by the name of Saunders came from a neighboring State into one of its eastern counties, in quest of a place of settlement. He was well dressed and well mounted, and traveled alone.

At the close of a fatiguing day's ride, he stopped at a house of entertainment, which was the nucleus or central point of a straggling backwoods village, containing some fifteen or twenty inhabitants. The host was a grim, sour-visaged man, with small, sinister looking eyes, which twinkled like burning points between the heavy fringe of the pointed eyebrows. The tavern building seemed to have been left in an unfinished state by the workmen, and looked ruinous and old for the want of paint and repairs.

On entering the bar-room, which was a dingy, half-lighted apartment, Mr. S. found a few men, very ordinary in both dress and appearance, relating to each other the gossip and news of the neighborhood. He seated himself in their midst, and awaited in silence the announcement of supper.

After eating a hearty meal, feeling both fatigued and drowsy, he requested to be conducted to his room. The landlord, taking a lamp in one hand, and the saddle-bags of the traveler in the other, went out of the bar-room into the yard, requesting Mr. Saunders to follow after him.

At the extreme end of the tavern buildings they ascended a flight of rude steps to an upper story. Entering a narrow, dark passage, Mr. S. was shown into a small, uncomfortable room, furnished with a bed, a chair, and a small table. The landlord put his lamp on the table, bade his guest good night, and immediately retired.

As the door of the room was without lock or fastening of any kind, Mr. S. placed the table and chair against it, blew out the light and lay down.

Overcome with fatigue and drowsiness, he soon fell asleep, but almost immediately awoke quivering in every limb, and in a state of extreme mental perturbation. He had dreamed a vivid and most frightful dream.

In his vision he saw a man, grim and dark, ascending the outer steps of the passage which led to his room. He bore a long glittering knife in his hand, and came up the steps with a slow and silent tread. At sight of him a feeling of apprehension—a presentiment that danger was nigh—came over the dreamer. He sprang out of his bed, opened his door, and stepped out into the passage. Opposite to his room he saw another door, through which he felt impelled to seek an escape. Opening it, he saw a hole in the middle of the floor, over which he saw the the timbers of a bedstead were extended, the cord hanging down to the floor beneath. As he was in the act of seizing this to let himself down, he awoke and found it was all a dream. He was still in bed, and the chair and table remained in the same position in which he had placed them against the door.

After revolving the dream in his mind for a few moments, his nerves became quiet and he again fell asleep, dreaming the identical dream over, awoke, as before, trembling and affrighted.

He got up out of bed, removed the chair and table from his door, and on opening it saw, what he had failed to observe before—that there was another door close shut, opposite to his room.

The full moon had risen and lit up the passage and upper rooms of the inn, with the radiance almost of day. Curiosity and the excitement of his dream prompting, he stepped across the passage and gave the opposite door a gentle push with his hand; it flew wide open, and displayed to the gaze of the now startled traveler the very objects and arrangements he had seen in his dream. In the middle of the room there was a large hole, made by the removal of short pieces of plank, across it lay the uncorded timbers of a bedstead, which suspended a stout rope, that reached almost to the floor below.

Thoroughly alarmed by this literal and utterly unexplained verification of his dream, Mr. S. returned to his own room, dressed himself in great haste, and with his saddle bags thrown over his arm, stepped out upon the platform at the head of the stair steps. His intention was to leave the tavern, and, if possible, get lodging for the night at a respectable looking house he had passed on the outskirts of the village. The next morning he could send for his horse and pay his bill by a messenger, and thus avoid explanation which might prove very unpleasant both to the landlord and himself.

The shadow of a large tree, which stood a few yards distant from the end of the building, fell upon the platform and nearly half of the stair steps. A brilliant moonlight rested on the yard and all other subjects on that side of the tavern.

Just as Mr. S. stepped out on the platform he saw a man come round the corner of the house, and walk in the direction of the steps. He had a large butcher knife in his hand, and looked wistfully around him as he advanced. As soon as he came to the bottom step, he began to ascend the stairs with a slow and silent tread. In appearance, movement and weapon, he was the exact counterpart of the image seen by Mr. Saunders in his dream.

What was the traveler to do, unarmed as he was, to escape the menacing peril? He felt glued to the spot upon which he stood by the very imminence of the danger which apparently confronted him. The leap from the platform to the earth would imperil both life and limb. A face to face encounter with an armed man could only end in his being desperately wounded or immediately killed. Nor was there even time to escape through the room with the hole in the floor, for the desperado had already mounted to the highest illuminated steps, and was only a few feet distant from where Mr. S. was standing.

Summoning all the resolution he could command, he cried out—

"Who comes there?"

Startled by the voice, the man threw up his face, and Mr. S. at once recognized him as the landrord of the inn. Without saying a word, he turned, almost ran down the steps, and Mr. S. hurried to the house on the outskirts of the village, where, after some entreaty, he procured lodgings for the night.

Early the next morning he sent a messenger for the horse, with money to pay the bill. He made no mention of the occurrence of the previous night; and as soon as the horse was brought, mounted him and resumed his journey.

Some years afterwards he met his former host, face to face upon one of the streets of Columbus, Georgia. They immediately recognized each other, but in a moment the quondam landlord threw his eyes down, seemingly much abashed, and hurried quickly by without saying a word.

Was a murder really meditated in this case? and was the dream which roused the intended victim a veritable premonition sent to rescue him from impending death? These are questions which the writer will not undertake to answer. He can vouch, however, for the literal truth of the facts herein related. They were communicated to him by the Rev. R. M. Saunders, of Alabama, son of the gentleman to whom the monitory dream was vouchsafed.

A WINE DRINKING NATION.

HON. JAMES O. PUTNAM, now in Europe, writes from Spain to the Buffalo Advertiser an interesting letter in regard to grape-raising and wine-making. In regard to intoxication he says:—

A few cents everywhere buys a bottle of wine,—its use is universal,—there is never a meal without it.

What is the effect of this abundance and this universal use upon the habits of the people?

I can only answer that I have sought the most intelligent sources of information, and have had but one reply, and that has been confirmed by my own observation, which has not been uninquisitive, that drunkenness is not a vice of the country, that excessive drinking of intoxicating liquors is not its habit; that while there are exceptional cases, as a nation it is one of sobriety. It is not true that there is an drunkenness; but it is rare, not habitual even in individuals, and is not felt as a public evil. Nor is it true that the wines drank in great excess will not intoxicate. You will think my curiosity a little impertinent—but I have visited hospitals both in Portugal and Spain, and enquired of their physicians if they ever had cases of delirium tremens,—that scourge which in our country opens the gate-way to death to so many gifted and noble natures—and their universal reply has been, that it was a disease unknown to the country. Private practitioners told me the same thing.

During the three months I have spent in Spain, I have seen but a single instance of intoxication; this was on a "bull fight" day, at Grenada. Another thing I have observed in Spain, no constant dram drinking. First let me say that the hotels in this country have no bar or saloon. The loungers, and the country swarms with them, visit the Cafes and Club-houses. The hotels are as quiet as a private dwelling. But if you were to visit those evening resorts of the people to see their life, you might find them all drinking but most of them would be drinking nothing stronger than coffee or lemonade, without spirits of any sort. Not to particularize any farther, I will give you a single experience. It is a representative fact, and therefore more significant.

I made the passage on the Berenguer, a Spanish steamer, from Cadiz to Havana—a voyage of twenty days. There were fifty-four first cabin, and fifty-seven second cabin passengers, among them half a dozen young army officers, on their way to their regiments at Havana. There were but eight or ten ladies, and all the passengers but two, Spaniards. There was no bar or "saloon" or anything answering to them, on the steamer, nor is there on any of the Spanish steamers. The common wine of the country was furnished as part of the breakfast and dinner, of which all drank—but very moderately—and, so far as I observed, of nothing else. The only exceptions were a Frenchman, and a Spaniard who had spent his days in England.

I never saw a passenger drinking spirits of any sort, with those two exceptions, and those not to any excess, except at their meals. There could hardly have been more sobriety of conduct if it had been a body of delegates to a temperance convention. It was so novel a steamboat experience to me, that on my arrival at Havana I asked the steward what amount of liquors of all sorts had been sold during the voyage. And what result do you suppose the examination of his books gave me? It revealed an aggregate sale of sixteen bottles of brandy, and twenty four bottles of extra wines to the whole one hundred and eleven passengers, all told, during the entire voyage of twenty days.

Every evening would find fifteen or twenty passengers playing the usual steamboat games, but without spirits of any sort to drink. I think a score of men passing three hours of an evening in those steamboat amusements, with no beverage but tea and coffee, is a spectacle you must go beyond the States to see. I was so impressed with this, to me entirely new observation in steamboat life, that I enquired of the commanding officer if this sobriety were usual. He assured me it was, remarking that the Spaniard was a very moderate drinker of the stronger liquors, but that men, women and children drank the wines of the country at their meals.

A SCRAP OF HISTORY.

IT IS often remembered that truth is sometimes stranger than fiction, and it is even thus in the story following, and which is so well authenticated that it is woven in the history of our country. In the year 1674, two brothers of Oliver Cromwell left England for America, and settled in Woodbridge, New Jersey. Thence they removed and settled in Halifax county, North Carolina. Their names were John and Edward Cromwell, and they and their ancestors were originally called Crowell. They fled from England to seek an asylum in America, from the political storms that then impended over the name and house of the Protector. While on their voyage to this country, being apprehensive that persecution would follow them from the adherents of Charles II., then on the throne of England, they determined to change their name; which was done with much solemn ceremony, by writing their name each on paper, and cutting from the paper the letter M and casting it into the sea.

The family pedigree on parchment, recording these facts with many others relating to the family, was with them in North Carolina in an ornamental chest with other things of value, when a party of Tarleton's Legion, in 1780, marauding through that portion of Carolina, seized the chest and carried it off. These facts are undoubted. From the memory of the family the record was again made up and is still preserved among them. In the calm retreats of Carolina, the proud aspiring blood of Cromwell found repose. The furious political billows tossed them upon our pure virgin shores. It is said that these brothers had no participation in the political disturbance of their country, or the bloody work of their brother; and in the peaceful and quiet shades of Halifax county, far from political strife and bloodshed, they sat securely under their own "vine and fig tree." Truly the beautiful and exquisite lines of Gray were here fully realized!

"Some mute, inglorious Milton here may rest,
Some Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood."

Edward Crowell, the son of this Edward who emigrated from England, removed to Georgia and married Miss Rayburn, sister of George Rayburn. He had a large plantation on Flint river; lived in retirement, and was a modest, unobtrusive character. He had several children, among whom was Col. John Crowell, formerly a member of Congress from Georgia, and for several years Indian Agent. He dwelt in a magnificent residence at Fort Mitchell, near the Chattahoochee river, and not many miles from Columbus. The story of their ancestors is still told in the family, but not boastingly, for they are peaceful, quiet people, who oppose every tendency to ostentation. The writer of this has been often when a child at the house of Col. Crowell, and never remarked any peculiarity in the family, although they had such a famous uncle as "Old Nell." Reference for these facts can be obtained, in part, from the history of North Carolina, where they are well authenticated.

THE POPE, in July last, confirmed a decree of the propaganda, granting the prerogative of the highest rank to the See of Baltimore, so that the archbishop of that diocese henceforth takes precedence in all meetings and councils above any other archbishop in this country.

MR. BENSON'S ALLEGED PLAGIARISM.

Rev. J. J. Wheat, Pastor of the Methodist Church at Natchez, Miss., as our readers know, charges Mr. Benson, the author of Benson's Commentaries, with wholesale plagiarism from Poole's Annotations.

The charge was first published in October last, and, in reply to articles on the other side, has recently been renewed with elaborate earnestness.

Whatever may be thought of Mr. Wheat's assertion, or of the arguments with which he sustains it, his candor is unimpeachable—he being a Methodist, as was Mr. Benson—a Poole having been a Presbyterian. We are frank to say, however, that while no one questions the particular facts alleged by Mr. Wheat, it is plain, as we think, that he has been misled in judgment as to what constitutes plagiarism, properly understood, in a commentator.

Plagiarism, in the sense charged, is simply literary theft. This is wholly untrue of Mr. Benson; for his credits to Poole are frequent; there is hardly a single paragraph in which he copies Poole verbatim; and his use of Poole is not hidden, but open and acknowledged, both in form and by implication—both where he refers to Poole and where he does not; for the former directs the reader as to the latter, and was palpably so intended.

It is a simple difference of opinion between Mr. Wheat and Mr. Benson, as to how often it is necessary for one commentator to mention the name of a former one, and as to how much change he is bound to make in the mere verbiage of interpretations that have been settled for centuries. In the sense of Mr. Wheat, no doubt every commentator, at least every modern one, is a plagiarist—even Poole himself.

The settled interpretations of all the plainer portions of scripture, which involve neither critical nor theological controversy, as now well nigh stereotyped in all the commentaries, are the work of no one man; they have grown up, like the coral continents and islands that constitute the subaqueous world, by the gradual accretion of years and ages. Under different hands, in different centuries, the thoughts have grown, like young fruit, until they have reached the roundness and fulness of maturity, and the words have budded forth, one by one, like the leaves in spring-time—some having been removed and others added—until an accepted interpretation, in a standard style, has become the property of the Christian world.

In modern times, therefore, the authorship of a commentary does not by any means involve the necessity of inventing new clothing for the legitimate and baptized exegetical children of the Christian family. The work of a new commentator is totally different from this. There are many reasons why it should not be done. While we are exhorted to "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints," we are also exhorted to "hold fast the form of sound words."

In commentaries, so far as all the plain, practical and fundamental parts of the scriptures are concerned—essential to sound faith and godly practice—and this includes the body of the Bible—the author should choose, among all who have gone before him, the best styles and statements in each particular case, except where he is convinced he can make improvement. This Mr. Benson has done. The Wesleyan divines were well acquainted with Poole, yet Mr. Benson is their chosen commentator. In the difference of opinion, therefore, between Mr. Wheat and Mr. Benson, the Wesleyan divines, as well as all others who are well acquainted with Poole and Benson, are with the latter; for none of them ever dreamed that Benson was a plagiarist. Mr. Wheat was the first in that dream.

The Methodist Ritual is about as much a plagiarism as Benson's Commentaries. Instead of being condemned, he should be commended for the very thing in question. The sooner there shall be one speech in all the Israel of God, the better. Most of the controversies that create bitterness between the different bodies of evangelical Christendom are mere strifes of words. It would be well, if all confessions of faith, all articles of religious belief, all commentaries, so far as the common faith and practice of the Christian churches are concerned, could be in the same language, made up of the best words of the best writers among them all. And, as a rule, the oldest English, within the Elizabethan age, is the best; as in the English of the Bible, so in that of commentators, and theological and devotional writers generally.

In this discussion, we are inclined to the opinion that Mr. Benson's reputation as a biblical scholar is not in much danger. Mr. Wheat may be right in his facts, but he is astray in his inferences. He is a sincere man, an able and worthy minister, and an earnest biblical student. Already with the facts he mentions, his inferences were not, at first blush, unreasonable; and his candor and love of truth induced the publication of his views, probably, before gaining that more thorough knowledge of the historical facts connected with the creation of commentaries, and that more comprehensive induction in the premises, which might have changed his mind.

Mr. Benson, we are satisfied, needs neither screening nor apology. But, had he needed either, he would not have found in Mr. Wheat, it seems, one who would—like the filial-hearted sons of the good old patriarch, when found in a condition not to be scrutinized—cover his fault with the mantle of charitable silence. This is a matter of taste, however.

CORRESPONDENCE FROM ALABAMA.

Religious Interest in Montgomery—Alabama to raise $64,000 Missionary Money this year—Publishing House Affairs—New Parsonage.

A yourneyman friend—no matter who—not a member of any church, in a private letter, says some things which we think would do no harm by a little "airing." We beg his pardon for publishing the following extracts:

"The religious world of Montgomery is apparently much engaged at this time. Union prayer-meetings are being held daily at one of four churches in the city, during the first four days of the week; and the attendance on them is said to be large, and the interest increasing. Drs. Sehon and Huston spent last Sunday with us. They were on their way to attend a missionary meeting at Mobile. They took up a collection in the Methodist church during their stay, but I do not know with what success. By the way, they say they expect the churches of the Alabama Conference to contribute $64,000 to the missionary cause this year—a pretty heavy sum, when it is considered that agents are in the field soliciting subscriptions for two first-class Colleges—also for the establishment of a Depository at Mobile—also for the Tract and Bible Societies—and some other local schemes for the promotion of religious views.

"Dr. Hamilton is now a resident in Montgomery. By the way, I hear that his beautiful daughter was married this morning. His health is still very feeble, but he is very busy with his agency. He presented the subject to the congregation Sunday before last, and made the gratifying announcement that $40,000 had been already subscribed, though very few churches had been visited. He got one hundred dollars out of me, as I advocated the establishment of the Publishing House as a great Southern measure. By the by, why do you not take side line of argument in favor of the Publishing House at Nashville. I am sure there are thousands of Southern-Rights men, outside the pale of the Church, who would gladly contribute to the aid of Southern literature, if the subject were brought before them in this light.

"As I understand it, you do not confine yourselves to the publication of religious literature. History, Philosophy and Belles-Lettres, all find a place in your comprehensive plan of operations. Southern men, not professedly religious, are therefore almost as much interested in the success of your Publishing House as are the members of the Methodist Church.

"The Methodists of Montgomery have torn down their old parsonage, which was an eye-sore to the neighborhood, and are building a neat brick edifice on the old foundation. They are also at last engaged in finishing their church, which for size, and finish inside, has always been one of the finest houses of public worship in the State. When the outside is made to correspond with the interior, the congregation may well be proud of their church."

THE EUROPEAN QUARREL.

A Comprehensive View.—The Times' Picture of the Seat of War.—Sardinia in danger of being Crushed before the French can arrive.—The Pro-Austrian View of the Quarrel.—The Anti-Austrian View.

We shall attempt, in this article, to give our readers a comprehensive and satisfactory view of the questions, and of the attitude of the nations, involved in the European quarrel, so far as it can be obtained from the American and European press. Of course there are great differences of opinion, according to the different interests, prejudices, and points of view of different writers.

The following striking description of the respective positions and prospects of the Austrian, Sardinian and French armies, is from the London Times:

"Austria has 200,000 men either upon the Ticino or within such a distance that they can be placed upon the banks of that frontier river within the three days of grace fixed in the imperative demand of the Austrian General. Sardinia occupies the opposite bank with a force which could not, probably, delay its own destruction for one day by that gigantic enemy. It may be that Sardinia can show 70,000 men in arms, including her free corps, gathered from all parts of Italy, and comprehending no small portion of the discontented spirits who have passed their lives in making manifestations of hatred to the foreigner. Of these 70,000, perhaps after garrisoning her great fortresses, Alessandria and Genoa, she may be able to range 40,000 men in line of battle. Three days of respite are all that is given. If, as we read the telegram, the demand has been already made, next Sunday may see an Austrian army in quick advance upon Turin. The position of Sardinia is perilous, but it is a position from which she cannot escape by a tame compliance. The march from the banks of the Ticino to Turin is through a plain country unprotected by any place of military strength, well known by operations in a recent campaign, and offering every facility for the advance of a great army. Three days would bring the Austrian General to the unprotected city of Turin.—There is nothing between the frontier and the capital but the arms and bodies of those 40,000 Sardinian troops, who are so vastly outnumbered by the Austrian hosts. To crush that army, to effect by force the disarmament demanded, and to dictate terms at Turin, would be but the effort of a few days if Sardinia remained unfriended. When we see her in this imminent danger, we look round anxiously to measure how far off are her friends, and what may be the chances of timely assistance. We may assume, perhaps, that the passing of the Ticino will be considered by the Emperor of the French as a declaration of war by Austria, and that while the Austrians are marching from the East upon Turin, the French Emperor will be pouring his columns from the West, and marching through the passes of the Alps to meet the Austrian invaders, and to anticipate, if possible, their arrival at the Sardinian capital. For this purpose we may consider Grenoble or Briancon as containing the whole force of the French Empire, for the chains of communication by rail are so complete that continuous columns might be directed from all parts of France upon those cities. The columns, however, that should take their way by Chambery and Mont Cenis, would find themselves 180 miles from Turin when crossing into the Piedmontese territory at the Pont de Benvoisin. Those which should advance by way of Embrun and Briancon over Mont Genevre could find a better road and a shorter distance on the Piedmontese side of the Alps, but would still scarcely hope to win the race against the Austrian troops coming by the plains. Again, help might quickly arrive from Toulon and Marseilles by way of Genoa. Toulon is rich in transports, and a few hours might land a respectable force at Genoa. From Genoa there is a railway to Turin, but, unfortunately, it winds far away up to the northeast, and an important portion of it would probably be reached and destroyed by the Austrians in their first day's march. We should not be very confident in trusting the safety of the kingdom to the possibility of uniting before Turin columns which had to penetrate the Alps and to arrive from Genoa, if one condition of the military success of such an operation were, that the concentration should be effected in three or four, or even in five or six days. Perhaps we may count something for the delay which may be reasonably expected to be interposed by the Sardinian army, either fighting or retreating; but, failing this, or those other chances of war which can never be fully calculated, the military heads who seem to have conceived this plan of opening the campaign, have not failed in strategic ability. Physically speaking, if the war is to come, the power which strikes the first blow and chooses its own field for action, will commence with an advantage.—Morally speaking, of course, the picture is reversed."

The English correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, who is prejudiced against Napoleon, and sympathetic with Austria, says that the latter has not wanted war—that the aggression commenced with the menacing speech of the French Emperor to the Austrian Minister on the first of January, and that that was only part of a foregone arrangement with Sardinia and Russia. He says that Austria has not refused a single requirement that could properly have been presented to her. Lord Cowley ascertained the professed views of the Emperor of the French. Austria agreed to them. Russia disturbed this arrangement by putting in the suggestion for a Congress. Austria again assented. She asked, it is true, that the disarmament of Sardinia should be made a preliminary condition, but when objected to, waived it and substituted the stipulation that the disarmament should be general.

But Sardinia would not disarm. As a price for her consent she must be admitted as a principal to the Congress. This was no part of the proposition of Russia, and introduced, therefore, an entirely new element. Why should Sardinia, which is the least Italian of all the Italian powers, be admitted, when the Pope and the King of Naples were excluded? Of course, Austria could not listen to anything so anomalous. The English Government, in their efforts at pacification, then proposed as a final attempt that all the independent Italian powers, including Sardinia, should be invited to join. This, however, in no way mended the matter. England and France have long ago broken off diplomatic relations with the King of Naples, and are not in a condition to ask him to join them in diplomacy; and the question was, by what right independent princes were summoned to confer with other powers on the management of the internal affairs of their own States. The Pope refused to have his functions, as an independent Prince, thus discussed.

"In her present ground of attack upon Sardinia she is moreover justified even to the most minute technicalities. Sardinia is bound by compact to surrender all deserters, instead of which she encourages and enrols them. Such conduct could in any case be met only by a categorical summons for its discontinuance. With regard to the enrolment of other volunteers, what power is there in the world that would allow such gatherings on its frontiers?"

"Austria is an agressor to the extent of a man who, seeing himself about to be waylaid and attacked by a couple of antagonists, has the wit, after having given fair warning, to rush upon the foremost and knock him down before the other is at his side."

On the other hand, the London Daily News, the organ of the Liberal party, denounces the course of Austria, in precipitating war, in spite of the remonstrances of England, and the proposals of the other powers. It says: "Austria has rejected the proposal of a Congress, on conditions to which all the other Great Powers, and also Sardinia, had assented. She dares not submit the frightful system she has pursued in Italy to inspection. Better war—better even defeat and compelled concession—than that horrible exposure and condemnation before Europe. This is a monstrous insult to all the neutral powers, but most of all to England. For the mean and groveling compliance of Lord Malmesbury—for the flattery of Lord Derby—for the sacrifices made by the entire Cabinet in preferring Austrian favor to the approval of their own just and generous countrymen, this is the fair return, the righteous retribution.

"To defend bad governments against peoples weary of suffering, Austria has successfully occupied every State in Italy.—Since 1815 her armies have been for five years in Naples, for six years in Tuscany, for six in Modena, for six in Parma, for twenty-five in the Papal States. There is not one of the petty princes south of the Po, who does not know that however badly he may behave, there is a great power at hand which will infallibly protect him against the indignation of his people. In 1815, Austria bound the King of Naples by treaty to administer his Government according to her absolutist principles. At Laybach, when there was danger that constitutional government might strike root in the same kingdom, Prince Metternich declared that "if the King himself wanted to establish the constitutial system, the Emperor would make war upon him." In 1822 the Austrian Minister declared, in the name of his master, that "the institution of representative Government could not and should not be established in any single Italian State." When the Austrians left the Pontifical States in 1822, the Emperor informed the Cardinal Legate of Forli that "he should return, as he had come, unasked, whenever he thought proper." When, in 1831, the French Government remonstrated against a renewal of the occupation of the Papal States, Metternich replied that his master was determined to interfere "at the cost of a general war." And now, we ask: Who is it that has associated freedom with war in Italy? Who but the Power that declares only by the sword shall Italy become free?"

On the same side, the London Morning Post, the organ of Lord Palmerston, contends that France has yielded all that could be reasonably expected, and says:

"It was but last Monday that the English Government announced to Parliament that the one remaining difficulty consisted in the obstinacy of Sardinia, who objected to divest herself of her small means of defense unless she were allowed a seat at the Congress which was to deal with her interests as well as those of all the Italian States. Lords Derby and Malmesbury, as well as Mr. D'Israeli, blamed the Cabinet of Turin, while the whole Liberal party stood forth in its defense. Sardinia was in the right. But, notwithstanding this, Count Cavour shrunk from the responsibility of provoking a war, however justifiable, and he gave way."

"Here, then, at last we had a final and distinct settlement of terms of negotiation sanctioned by Europe. Austria, however, positively, peremptorily, and finally rejects them. Her response to England is an ultimatum to Sardinia, giving her only three days to disband her forces. Of course the Court of Turin can give but one answer to such a summons. The time will expire on Sunday night, and on Monday or Tuesday we may expect the Austrian troops to cross the Ticino, and begin the war. Within a few hours of their passage of the frontier river, the French armies will be in full march over the Alps, and the European conflict will begin. When it will end no man can say; but we at once record our unhesitating opinion that the sympathies of England will be in favor of Sardinia and of the Italian cause."

INFIDELITY AND PERDITION OF WAR.

War is one of the things which Christians have seemingly agreed to consider as a "necessary evil." In the present state of the world it can no more be avoided than can the necessity for individual force, in certain cases, for the defence of person, property, liberty, life and family honor. But in itself, aside from necessitating and justifying causes, it is utterly diabolical.

If Satan ever smiles or sings, if hell ever rings with shouts of jubilant joy, it must be when hostile armies of hundreds of thousands of men, with the devilish death-enginery of modern warfare, meet in mortal conflict on the sanguinary battle-field! Thousands upon thousands of souls, most of them utterly godless, envenomed with the hate of war, hurled in a moment from life and its gracious privileges, precious hopes, and merciful possibilities.

And then a soldier is by virtue of his profession almost a sold slave to the devil, almost doomed to perdition. Even in the most Christian countries it is unprofessional to be pious, unmilitary to be mindful of God and the soul, cowardly to be conscientious, and poltroon-like to pray. Soldiers are the most hopeless heathen upon the face of God's redeemed earth—less cared for by the Church—less able to do without the gospel and its institutions!

A Christian soldier is the grandest of heroes. Havelock's name should be held in everlasting remembrance.

Should the expected European war take place, what a harvest will perdition reap! Does Christendom pray that it may be averted, or implore God's mercy on the thousands who go like sheep to the slaughter?

GERMAN METHODISM.

Nothing of the kind has surprised us more than the proposition recently made in the Christian Advocate and Journal, that the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, at its next session, May 1860, elect a Bishop from among the German ministers. Even the man proposed, Rev. William Nast, D. D., has been named in the papers. This smacks unmistakably of the partisan politician—offering honuses to particular sections and elements, and proposing to "divide the spoils" between different leaders. We believe this is the first instance of the kind in the history of American Methodism. We trust that the history of the Southern Church may never be marred by such a record. The right man for Bishop is the man who holds the highest place in the godly judgment of the General Conference and the Church as a man suited to the episcopal office, without regard to his nationality. He is not to be chosen or rejected because of his blood or nativity. No such distinctions should be made. From the North-western Christian Advocate, we learn that the German ministers take this view of the proposition. That paper says: "We regret that the question of electing a German to the episcopacy has been sprung upon the church. The excellent and learned man whose name has thus been brought before the public must be deeply mortified at seeing it made the theme of discussion. He is engaged in a great work, viz., the preparation of a German commentary upon the sacred Scriptures, and we would have him complete it.

"We also know that our German ministers look upon the proposition with well-defined disfavor. They regard it as calculated to place them in a false position before the church; to cause belief that they are disposed to create, or at least preserve, national distinctions in the church, and that such a demand upon their part would look much like a preparation for separate organization.

"The resolutions of the West Wisconsin Conference, found in another column, speak of the importance of Americanizing our foreign population, and we suppose none will question the wisdom of that, but we submit that the process is rapidly going forward in our German churches. Their children come to us, and nothing can prevent it. The increase of membership in the German work is largely from the ranks of the opposition, while their children are found at our altars. They are rapidly Americanized. The free school, the ballot-box, the newspaper, are potential Americanizers. Beside these, Young Germany sees sunlight in the eyes of Yankee girls, and attends "their meeting." There is no more idle dream than that of maintaining a separate nationality amid the whirl, roar, and rush of American society."

NORTH CAROLINA ADVOCATE ON SOCIETARIANISM.

The North Carolina Christian Advocate, in an argument for establishing a Depository of our publications at Raleigh, says: The American Tract Society has a depository in Raleigh, and has its agents throughout the State, through whom it is scattering thousands of volumes in the homes of the people. We cheerfully concede all that can be justly claimed by that Society, of benefit to perishing souls, by means of its publications. We have seen no book or tract with its imprint, in which the good did not exceed the evil. But it is high time for the intelligent Methodists of North Carolina to begin to estimate the consequences of tamely surrendering the field to that society. Its publications do not directly assail the doctrines or organization of Methodism. Its managers and its authors may not design to assail our church by indirection. Nevertheless, nine-tenths of the books on its catalogue are from the pens of Calvinists—men of piety and ability, but thorough Calvinists. And hence it is, while open assaults are not made upon our doctrines, the fundamental principles of Calvinism are assumed to be scriptural; its premises are cunningly wrought into histories and biographies, and then overlaid very skilfully with facts and incidents of religious experience. And thus, the uninstructed reader is gradually beguiled into the admission of doctrines, which, if directly profounded, would never have found admission to his creed. Nor can we fail to observe how nearly all the biographies and narratives of that society, however excellent in other respects, have a direct tendency to create in the minds of young readers, a beau ideal of religious life in which no place is found for the glorious peculiarities and historic associations of Methodism; in which a settled pastorate supercedes the itinerancy, and the lines of the picture only shadow forth Methodism, as a temporary expedient of church enlargement, to be abandoned when its first work is done. We do not say that the society intends any thing but what is fair and catholic; we would not pluck a single laurel from its perennial crown.

But as a Methodist, loving all, and believing that Methodism ought to have a future still more glorious than the past; as a Methodist, content to incur present odium, if necessary, in defense of the interests and usefulness of our church for generations to come; we respectfully ask the most serious consideration of our readers for these facts. Already there are indications of a renewal of the old contest for the predominance of free grace over "the horrible decrees."

Our fathers won the victory over Calvinism, and we have reposed in too much security upon their achievements. How much encouragement to battle again for error, our mistaken Calvinistic brethren may have derived from a belief that the public mind is prepared to give them a more favourable hearing, by the very general circulation of their doctrines in a diluted form by the American Tract Society, we have no means of knowing. But we are sure that allegiance to truth, faithfulness to God, and duty to our church, forbids the ministers and members of the North Carolina Conference to slumber longer upon the vital question of giving a sound Methodist literature to our people.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Life at three Score: A Sermon by Albert Barnes.—Albert Barnes has spent thirty-four years in the ministry. Of these, twenty-eight have been in the service of the First Presbyterian church, Philadelphia. On the twenty-eighth day of last November, on a rainy Sabbath—so he informs us in the preface—when comparatively few persons were in attendance, he delivered extemporaneously to his congregation a discourse reviewing somewhat his past life, showing what a cheerful and hopeful view of life may be held by one of sixty.

To fulfill the desire of possession of those who heard it, as well as the wish of the absent to know what was said upon the subject, the discourse was written out, published, and has passed to a second edition.

On the first day of December, Mr. Barnes reached his three score years; says he, "a period not only of great moment to myself, but eminently favorable for taking a view of life as it appears in the past and in the future. A man who has reached the sixtieth year of his life, ought to be able to give some views of living, which will be worth the attention of those who are starting on the way; he ought to be able to offer some counsel which is safe and wise for those who are young to follow; he ought to be able so to speak of the temptations of the world, as to show how they may be avoided or overcome; he ought to be able to say something which will encourage the next generation in the duties of life; he ought to be able to offer something bright and hopeful in regard to the prospects which are to open upon the world which he is soon to leave, bright and hopeful in regard to the world to which he is soon to go."

The Parent and the Sunday School.—This is the title of a neat little pamphlet of thirty-five pages from the pen of I. R. Finley, D. D., of the Virginia Conference, and published by the author. The subject is—"What is the relation subsisting between parents and the Sunday school; and what are the duties which grow out of that relation, both to the school and their children." It is comprehensive in statement, strong in argument, powerful in appeal, and classical in style. The first edition of a thousand has already been exhausted, and the second is forthcoming. We commend it.

The May number is received of the Southern Rural Magazine, American Cotton Planter and Soil of the South, published at Montgomery, Ala., and edited by Dr. Cloud.

PROFESSOR JOHN DARBY.

The many friends of that esteemed and able naturalist, Prof. John Darby, will concur in the tribute given below, from a correspondent of the Augusta (Ga.) Dispatch, reporting the Quarantine Convention in New York.

I was pleased to see that the South was well represented by some of her most eminent and competent men. Among others I saw Professor Darby, of Alabama, who came before the Convention with his new disinfectant, and with numerous striking and convincing experiments, succeeded in impressing it with the beauty and value of the discovery. How far available for large purposes this fluid may be, remains to be tested, but judging from the expressions of opinion from the most eminent scientific men here, there can be no doubt of its great value. He also illustrated, with a piece of apparatus called a Miasmometer, a new and easy method of determining organic impurities in the atmosphere. These discoveries of Prof. Darby do honor to our country, and place him among the foremost of our scientific investigators. The venera his Dr. Francis and Mott, of this city, lent the aid of their deep learning and extensive experience to the Convention; while the celebrated Dr. Sims, a former resident of Alabama, but now Surgeon and Physician to the Woman's Hospital here, was prominent among its active supporters.

There is no city in the union in which a disinfectant, such as Prof. Darby has discovered, is more needed than New Orleans, and we hope that experiments will be made here to test its efficacy.

TRIALS OF COMPLAINTS BY CONFERENCE COMMITTEES.

At the recent New York East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, two cases of complaint, says the Christian Advocate and Journal, involving charges of immorality, were presented from the Bridgeport district, and the Conference determined to try them by committees, agreeable to the provisions of the Discipline, (made at the last General Conference, and found on the 93d page of the small Book of Discipline.) Committees of twelve each were appointed by the Bishop, and a president of the court, not a member of the committee—and before these the cases were heard as in open Conference, and the decision of the committee becomes the act of the Conference. These were the first cases ever so treated in this Conference; and the opinion of those who witnessed the working of the plan seemed to be, that while it affords an innocent man the fullest opportunity to exculpate himself, it is terribly severe upon the guilty.

This plan is worthy of consideration by the Southern Church, as every observant man who has ever witnessed trials, or the investigation of complaints, before our annual Conferences, must know. However necessary, the days of closed doors are over, and such things before, promiscuous assemblies, are wrong in themselves, unhappy in influence, imperfectly conducted, and unnecessarily wasteful of time.

VALUE OF OUR ADVERTISING COLUMNS.

Not their value to ourselves particularly—that depends upon the knowledge of their value to those who advertise; and of that we now principally speak. We have more than double the circulation of any other Weekly published in New Orleans, and much the largest of any paper published in the South-west. We are increasing rapidly—more than a thousand within the past year. We shall continue to increase. The time is coming when we shall have double our already large circulation.

Then we have not room for many advertisements; they are therefore not lost in a vast crowd of advertisements, but are readily seen and read. Then our readers are of the best classes of society. They read, they trade, they pay—and a majority of them pray. They are spread over a large extent of the best country in the Union—Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee. Then our readers—we say it thankfully—have confidence in what we say. We do not puff; we call attention, and when we know the value of what is advertised, we commend.

A certain hoarding house ("Brooks") put in a card—we commended, knowingly—and from Western Texas to East Alabama, they come. "Everybody" goes to "Wright's" for medicines, of course, and so he should, "and his wife" too. "Lowber" is the great machine man of the South-west. To whom do the people from the country go for groceries? Why, to Arthur & Co—Cooper and Neibert—Tharp and McCray—F. W. Ober. Booth is the hat man—Willard the coal man—Jackson, and Armistead, the clothing men—Sawyer the Woodenware man—Keeler the soap man—Werlin the music man and Read the Druggist.

Hill sells the lamps—Vinten the type—Hubbs the mills—Dameron, and Watkins and Homon, the carpets etc. Elam, Roberts, and Fuqua and Kilbourne are the lawyers. Stuart and James—Lowe & Co—Van Bibber & Co—Boyd & Co—Fash & Co—Pilcher and Goodrich—Wyche & Co—May & Co—Poyne and Harrison—Wolker and Hutchinson—Lane and Mayfield—T. T. Twitty—Broadwell and Haynes—are the Commission Merchants. Wilson does the magic-press-work. Bloomfield and the Bulletin do the job work. Wasson is the builder—Rayne sells the boots and shoes—Benthuysen and Lewis the dry-goods—Kendall and Carter Daniel Pratt's cotton gins. Dr. Beach offers his services.

Where do they educate their daughters? Why at Monsfield—Huntsville—Columbus—Memphis—Summerfield. And their sons? At Ruterville—Centenary—Summerfield.

Some people complain of our prices. In answer, we have simply to say, that we know of one man who would take every column we have to spare, at the present rates, if we would permit him. Were we to lower our rates, we should make less, and be so crowded as to have much less reading matter.

We are constantly asked, by those who seek our advice, verbally and by letter, to give the names of the best men in the various departments of business, and of the best institutions, etc. Those who advertise, and pay, are, of course, not forgotten at such times.

A card of five lines in the Advocate, with an editorial notice, is worth thousands of dollars to any good business, that is capable of expansion. If the people need what you wish to sell, they will buy of you, and largely—for there are many of them—if you tell them, through the Advocate, where you are, and what you have. We really pity many deluded people who remain comparatively poor, when they might prosper abundantly by advertising in the Advocate.

What is the economy of objecting to pay fifty or a hundred dollars a year for advertising, when it will bring a trade of thousands? "Advertise—do not "jew" about the price—pay promptly—and you will prosper, if you ought to prosper. We advertise for pay—and we pay those who advertise. When you wish to advertise, read our terms on the third page, and remit the money with the advertisement. If you cannot tell exactly the amount, make a remittance any how—we shall give you due credit, and refund what you overpay. But overpaying is a danger that is not imminent. There is no personal interest in this—the money all goes to the improvement of the paper.

NEW ORLEANS AND THE INTERIOR.

New Orleans and the Interior.—Death of Mrs. Soule.—Drainage of Swamp lands—Summer preparations—Ocean Springs—Its Hotel.—The springs and Ponce de Leon.—Southern Oil Company.—Florida Mails.—Nashville.

An encouraging evidence of the increasing public spirit which is destined to be one of the chief elements of Southern character, and also, a hopeful indication of the appliness to be used in increasing the comfort and desirableness of New Orleans homes, is seen in the movement, now progressing successfully, for the drainage of the swamp lands back of the city from the river, and between it and Lake Ponchartrain. The greatest cause of malaria, if cause it be, will thereby be removed, and, fronting on the Lake on one side, as well as on the river on the other, salt water and marine breezes will prove a blessing to the city.

The recent death of Mrs. Armentine Soule, consort of our distinguished fellow-citizen, Pierre Soule, has excited a profound sensation and general sorrow throughout the Creole portion of this community especially, and also among her friends generally. No lady says a well-informed daily exchange, could have been more respected and beloved for her many virtues and accomplishments. Those beautiful traits which adorn with so much luster the characters and persons of our Creole ladies, were never combined in more lovely harmony and beauty than in this estimable lady. Though totally unacquainted with the family, yet this is the reputation she has enjoyed, and the memory which survives her.

Preparations for spending the summer begin to appear. Many, as usual, fly away to the North; but an increasing number are preparing to enjoy, during the warm season, the salt breezes, sea-bathing, and delightful fishing afforded by our numerous lake-shore resorts.—Bay St. Louis, Pass Christian, Mississippi City, Biloxi, and Ocean Springs. We had never seen, except from the deck of a steamer any of these famous retreats, until recently, when visiting Ocean Springs. All these places are between New Orleans and Mobile, on the lake-shore, in Mississippi, and in sight of the track of the daily mail steamer between the two cities. They present beautiful pictures of rural quiet and comfort to the passing denizen of the city.

Ocean Springs is the farthest resort from New Orleans about mid-way between it and Mobile, and said to possess greater natural advantages for a summer residence than any of the others. The shore is high and abrupt, the exposure to the Gulf breeze sufficient, the protection by low islands good, the fishing excellent, and the situation beautiful. The Hotel, owned by Mr. Geer of St. Louis, kept by Mr. Wilkinson of the Sea-Coast Democrat, with one of the best land-ladies in the country, is to be conducted, during the coming summer, in a style of the most sumptuous comfort. A delightful breakfast and dinner there, on our recent visit, has not weakened our conviction of the truth of this representation, made to us before. Providence permitting, we shall visit Ocean Springs and its hotel again. At the other watering places, you must get out on the arrival of the steamer, night or day, fair weather or foul; and then you must, in the night or in the rain, go down to the wharf and wait the coming of the steamer, sometimes for hours. At Ocean Springs, the end of the trip, you need not get out till morning, and can know precisely when to return on board, which is always in daylight.

The Ocean Springs takes its name from the mineral spring near it, said to possess valuable medicinal qualities, and which, according to the most romantically enthusiastic admirers of the place, was the famous "fountain of youth" which Ponce de Leon "sought but never found," but which the Indians valued and used for three hundred years past, and how much longer is not recorded. We were shown some fine specimens of piney-woods children, and were assured that they and their mothers had used the water.

An enterprise in which Southerners are deeply interested, is the Southern Oil Company, with its work in Mobile, and office located here. It commenced only a few years ago, manufacturing oil from the rosin so plentifully supplied by our Southern pine forests. At first, the oil was not receptable. It was oil, but it also contained grease and varnishing substances, which injured its practical use. There was a prospect of the works stopping, when some public spirited citizens here and in Mobile, stepped forward and gave new enterprise and vigor to the scheme; additional capital was subscribed; additional works built; renewed experiments made, until finally the successful point was reached, and an oil was furnished at cheap rates, entirely pure, limpid, free from grease, gum or varnishing qualities. As soon as this was known, orders flowed rapidly in; the railroads, steamboats, founderies and other places where a superior lubricating material was indispensible, becoming steady and large patrons. The works will have to be enlarged to meet this constantly increasing demand, and the success of the enterprise is inciting the commencement of similar factories in Texas and other States near us, where the pine forests abound.

We understand that, the advertisement of 13th December last not providing for the service desired, the Postmaster General has invited proposals for semi-monthly trips, for four years from the 1st of July next, in first-class sea steamers of not less than 400 tons, customhouse measurement, from New Orleans, by Pensacola, Apalachicola, St. Marks, Cedar Key, Tampa and Manatee, to Key West, in Florida. Also separate proposals for semi-monthly trips between New Orleans and Cedar Key, and once a week thence to Key West; and for the extension of the latter to Havana, for the postages. Also separate proposals for direct service between Cedar Key and Key West, and for the separate supply of Tampa and Manatee by steamer; and, also, for additional service between New Orleans and Cedar Key, direct. Bids to be received till 9th June next, to be decided the second day thereafter.

The population of the suburbs, is 6700 making a total 31,813. The manufactures of the city reach $2,374,700; the total trade, exclusive of manufactures, is $22,475,812. About one hundred steamboats visit the port during a year, with an average tonnage of 108,000. Half Volume at one Dollar.—By resolution of our publishing Committee, at their late meeting, it was determined to make the volume of the Advocate begin and end with the year. It began before about the first of February. The present volume, therefore, will close with December, and the succeeding one begin with January next. The price of subscription from the first of July to the first of January will be one dollar. New subscribers will please send either one dollar, or three dollars, as they choose. We shall increase our issue on the first of July, that new subscribers during that month may receive back numbers, and begin with the half volume. Let us begin it with a largely increased list—Brother Agent, how many new subscribers can you obtain between now and the first of July? Let us have a thousand.

"Foot-Prints across the Continent."—Bishop Pierce's letters commence in this week's Advocate. We have added some hundreds to our present weekly issue, that we may supply those new subscribers who may wish to have the Bishop's letters from the beginning. To all such we shall send the back numbers until they are exhausted. Those who wish them would do well to subscribe soon.

Our Paper, our readers will observe, has facilities for furnishing them with the latest foreign news, equal to any secular paper in the land, and superior to any religious paper. Both this week and last, the Advocate has been the first to take the European war news to the country. We shall keep our readers posted as to this great European struggle, and in reference to all important current intelligence.

Mansfield Female College, we are glad to hear, is in good condition, giving general satisfaction, and steadily growing in public confidence. It is an "institution," not an experiment. Rev. Dr. Thweatt, the President, happily combining the attainments of the scholar, the aptness of the teacher, and the paternal amiabilities of the academic governor, is the very man for his post. He is assisted by a full and competent Faculty.

A Desirable Family Residence, in the classic town of Jackson, La., seat of Centenary College, is advertised in another column.

Broadwell & Payne, whose card will be found in another column, is an established and reliable house, worthy of confidence and patronage. We call attention to their advertisement, and recommend them to our friends.

J. H. Keller, Soap Manufacturer, has his card in this paper. He is prepared to supply the whole country. When "you get out of soap," send to Keller. He is worthy. "He hath built us a synagogue"—or rather, been the leading man in building our beautiful German Church up town.

Columbus, Mississippi, one of the most interesting and wealthy inland cities in the South-west, is, it is said, to be in communication with Mobile by the 4th of July next. They are building a branch road connecting with the Mobile and Ohio railroad. The Alabama road will connect them with the Jackson road, and with New Orleans. They are, also, building a new and splendid Methodist Church.

Poor Key!"—What a far-reaching, "representative," and sympathetic significance these words have in the columns of certain papers, in their moralizings upon the late tragedy at Washington! "A fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind."

A CORRESPONDENT of the N. Y. Evening Post thinks the literary treasures of the Vatican are guarded with a churlish ...iggardliness. He says: "Motley is trying to obtain access to the historical treasures of the Vatican, but has not much hope of success. When I passed through the famous library of the Vatican the other day, and walked nearly half a mile without seeing a single book or meeting a single reader, I must confess that I felt for a moment, and for the first time, a desire that the present controversy of the European powers over Italy might not end until the secrets of this great store-house of knowledge were unlocked, and made accessible at least to the historian and the student. At present, the Vatican library and manuscripts are of scarcely more value to the world than the collection at Alexandria, which the famous dilemma of Achmet consigned to the flames."

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

All Europe on the Verge of War.

Further by the Adelaide—Arrival of the Persia—The Adelaide's news confirmed—Provisions of the Russo-French Treaties—Russia to declare War against Austria—Insurrection in Hungary anticipated—Tuscan revolution confirmed—Spanish Naudl Preparations—The Military operations in Italy—Revolt in Modena and Parma.

Since our last issue, we have fuller accounts by the Adelaide. The Franco-Russian alliance is confirmed. Sardinia in dignantly rejects the ultimotum of Austria. The reported alliance of Tuscany with France and Sardinia, which seemed improvable, as the Grand-Duke was in the interest of Austria, turns out to mean, that the army demanded a declaration of war against Austria, and an alliance with France and Sardinia, which the Grand-Duke refused, and then fled; whereupon the army proclaimed a military dictatorship. This is regarded as the beginning of a general Italian revolution.... An alliance between France and Denmark is reported.

The Persia left Liverpool April 30th, and confirms the Adelaide's, news.

The important provisions of the treaties between France and Russia, as published by the London Times, are that Russia binds herself in the event of war breaking out between France and Austria to co-operate with her fleets in the Baltic and in the Mediterranean, and to place an army of 50'000 men on the Austrian frontier.

The Times says that this treaty is obviously directed against England, and brings forward strong facts to prove that such is the case, and protests that England would not allow these powers to carry out the object they had in view.

The Times also expresses the opinion that the Russian army of observation is intended to excite an insurrection among the Sclaves and Hungarians in Austria.

The second treaty between Russia and France provides that, if Austria invades Sardinia, Russia shall declare war against Austrin within fifteen days.

The Times maintains that England need not take an active part in the war so long as the war is confined to Italy, but that if France or Russia should attack Austria in Germany, with a view on the part of Russia of seeking indemnity by acquiring territory in the East of Europe, or if Prussia should be laid under contribution of any portion of her territory, which would be in effect to partition or divide between Russia and France, then England would have to decide whether she could best protect her interests and her existence as a leading power by joining her army and navy against her enemies on the continent, or keeping them at home to protect herself.

The Times says that the existence of a great German power is essential to the safety of England.

The King of Sardinia, in the proclamation he has issued, declares that the Austrian ultimatum, requiring Sardinia to disarm is an outrage upon himself and an insult to the nation.

The King says to the army: "I will be your Captain, you will have the gallant French soldiers who were your companions on the Tchernaya (in the Crimea) for your support. Our war cry is, 'The Independence of Italy!'"

General Cavalgnac has been appointed Lieutenant-Geueral of the Sardinian Army.

The Universities of Piedmont have been closed, and the students are joining the army with great enthusiasm.

In conformity with a decree of the King the Sardinian troops have retired from Palasca to the west bank of the Segia.

The bulk of the Sardinian Army, seventy-five thousand strong, are concentrated around the fortresses of Alessandria and Casale near the frontier of Lambardy.

The second line of the army is stationed at the foot of the Appenines between Noxo and Fortona.

The Turin correspondent of the London Times expresses the opinion that the Austrian army will not succeed in reaching the capital of Sardinia at all, notwithstanding the boast of the Emperor of Austria that he would be in Turin within ten days from the time his army crossed the Ticino.

The country along the frontier of Sardinia, over which the Austrian army will have to pass, has been submerged by water from the canals used for irrigation, and the roads have been rendered impracticable for the present.

The news of the military revolution in Tuscany and of the army having joined that of Piedmont is confirmed.

The Grand Duke of Tuscany has refused the demand of the army for him to abdicate, and has retired to Bologna, begging the protection of the five powers.

The Tuscan army at present numbers 15,000 men.

The English channel fleet, which is supposed to have sailed for the Mediterranean, will be immediately recalled, and its place supplied by new ships to be placed in commission at once.

It is stated that the French and Russian Governments have lately been procuring large supplies of charts and surveys of the English coasts and the British Mediterranean stations, and likewise buying large quantities of coal, irrespective of quality or price.

It is also intimated that extensive orders for English charts have been received from the Spanish Government, and the inference is that Spain has thrown herself into the arms of France.

Twenty-seven gun boats and some large vessels of war are being built on the Thames for the Spanish Government. It is supposed by some that Spain is merely acting as agent for France and Russia.

Large quantities of ammunition and guns are being shipped from England to Gibraltar and Malta.

General Williams, of Kara celebrity, has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

The French Ministry of Police are being established after the fashion of the first Emperor?

The French Army of Observation on the Rhine consists of eight divisions, each composed of cavalry and infantry.

Genoa is to be occupied by the French Army as the base of operations for the troops arriving by way of the Alpino pass.

It is expected that 80,000 French troops will be in Italy before the end of the week.

Mr. Iolento, of the London Exchange, has been declared a defaulter to the amount of £300,000 to £500,000.

The London Herald also says that Modena and Parma, Austrian dependencies, have declared for Sardinia; and that the Austrian Government is determined on vigorous movements, and is desirous of striking a blow before the arrival of the French army.

Although the French troops are going rapidly by sea to Genoa, they arrive there without the necessary arms and annuition to commence the campaign at once.

Three Days Later—Arrival of the Weser and the Borussia.

WAR ACTUALLY COMMENCED.

Austria Wins the First Battle—Sardinian Vessels Seized by Austria.—Sardinians Retreating before the Austrians.—Hostilities commenced April 29.—Great activity in the British Navy.—Numerous failures in London and Paris.—Decline in Cotton.

NEW YORK, May 5.—The steamship Weser, of the Bremen line and the Borussia of the Hamburg line have arrived at this port.

The Borussia left Hamburg on the 1st of May and Southampton on the 3d, bringing three days later advices from Liverpool, London and Paris than were received by the Adelaide at St. Johns.

Commercial Intelligence.

LIVERPOOL, May 3.—The sales of cotton for the two business days since the sailing of the Adelaide amount to only 9000 bales All qualities of cotton have declined ¼ to ⅛. Messrs. Clare & Son report a decline of fully ¼ since Saturday. Others say the decline is nearly ¼. The market closed dull and prices are too irregular to give any reliable quotations. The Liverpool Breadstuffs market closed buoyant. The Provision market generally closed with an advancing tendency.

LONDON, May 3.—The English funds have somewhat recovered.

Political and General Intelligence.

LIVERPOOL, May 3.—The Report that the Austrians had crossed the Ticino and commenced hostilities is fully confirmed. The first actual engagement took place at the bridge of Buffalora where the passage of the Ticino was vigorously disputed by the small Sardinian force stationed there for its protection. The Austrians, however, with their superior force, took the bridge and crossed over into Sardinia after a sharp conflict in which considerable loss was sustained on both sides.

It is also reported that the Austrians have taken Mortara, one of the principle towns in the Sardinian province of Novara, and that the Sardinian army stationed at that place had retreated.

The Austrians are concentrating a large body of troops at Placenza, an important position near the Southern border of Sardinia in Parma.

The Austrians have seized all the Sardinian vessels on Lake Meggiore on the Northern frontier of Sardinia.

All the telegraphic lines running from Austria to Switzerland had been cut by the Austrians.

Advices from Vienna of the 1st of May announce that the Austrian troops have occupied without resistence the Sardinian frontier towns of Intra, Palanze and Azona—the Sardinian troops retreating at the approach of the Austrians.

Advices from Turin of the 28th of April announce that the steamer which arrived at Genoa on the 27th brought a proclamation which the King of Sardinia had issued to the Tuscan army inviting them to await the signal of war, and then advance in a compact body of 12,000 men to reinforce the Sardinian army.

A similar proclamation has been addressed to the troops in the Remagna, who have revolted in favor of Sardinia.

TURIN, April 29.—The French Marshal Canrobert and Marshal Neill arrived at Turin to-day, and at once proceeded to Allesandria to join King Victor Emanuel.

Fifteen thousand of the Imperial Guard of France have arrived at Genoa, by sea from Toulon, making 40,000 French troops now at Genen.

The French troops are also rapidly arriving at Suza, from Marseilles and Toulon.

Advices from the headquarters of the army state that the King of Sardinia, accompanied by Marshals Canrobert and Neill, had visited the line of the river Dora to make observations.

Three corps d'armee entered Piedmont by way of Gravellona. They consist of twenty battalions and eight heavy batteries of cannon.

England.

A royal proclamation has been issued, offering a bounty of £10 to seamen, for the purpose of recruiting ten thousand additional sailors. The greatest activity prevailed in the dockyards. Orders had been received at Woolwich navy-yard, from the British Admiralty, to complete with all haste the new-class steam-frigates now on the stocks.

Heavy failures have occurred among the stock brokers on the London Exchange, and numerous others are reported from all quarters.

It is said that the impoverishment and ruin on the Paris Bourse this week will far exceed anything which has ever occurred, though no failures had been reported up to as late as Monday.

LIVERPOOL, May 3.—The ship Pomona, which was wrecked off Wexford, had previously reported, had on board 395 passengers, and 52 in the crew. Only seventeen of the former and three of the latter were saved.

Advices from Turin of the 1st of May state King Victor Emanuel had gone to assume the command of the Sardinian army.

The advices also state that the Austrians were in force at Nevaro and Povia.

The French infantry still continue to arrive at Turin by the way of the Alps, and from Genoa, though no decisive movement has yet been made.

Advices from Berne, of the 30th ultimo, state that the Austrians, after seizing the Sardinian vessels on Lake Moggiore the evening previous, commenced hostilities.

Advices from Parma of the same date announce that the Grand Dutchess of Parma has fled, after instituting a regency, and the new Government of Parma had declared its adhesion to the cause of Sardinia.

Advices from Constantinople represent that Turkey is also actively preparing for war. The Porte had sent for Omar Pacha, who was on his way from Bagdad to Constantinople.

Sardinia had proposed to Spain to join Piedmont in the struggle against Austria, but the Spanish Government have expressed their intention to remain neutral.

The following is contained in an official letter from Prisco Gortschakoff, of Russia, to the British Government:

"I do not deny that there may exist a written engagement between the French and Russian Governments, but I can assure you in the most positive manner, that such engagement contains nothing that in the most distant manner could be interpreted as constituting a hostile alliance against Europe.

"If Lord Malmesbury should be questioned upon this subject he may answer with confidence in the above sense, and give you my personal guarantee that the declaration will not be falsified by the facts."

Advices from Wesnler state that the Czar had telegraphed the widow of the Grand Duke that Prussia and Austria are not threatened by Russia.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE OREGON BOUNDARY DISPUTE—which has arisen between the United States and Great Britain under the treaty by which the Oregon controversy was to have been settled, may prove to be serious. The difference between the Commissioners of the two Governments, relates to the whereabouts of the channel which seperates the Continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence Southerly to the Straits of Fuca. The English Commissioner claims that the boundary should run through the Straits of Rosario, nearest to the Continent, and Eastward of Orcas and Lopez Islands, in what is called Washington Sound. The American Commissioner claims the boundory to run through the Canal de Haro, nearest to the Island of Vancouver, which would place all the Islands of Washington Sound under the jurisdiction of the United States. The British claim would place all these islands under British jurisdiction.

THE O. S. PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY, which meets to-morrow, 19th May, at Indianapolis, the Presbyterian says is destined to be composed of more men of ability and experience, than any previous Assembly for years, and will have more important questions brought before it, viz: A Church Commentary; Seminary for the North-west; The Domission Question; Revision of the Book of Discipline; Marrying a Deceased Wife's Sister; A South-western Committee of Domestic Missions, to be located at New Orleans; and, it is possible, that the Associate Secretaryship of the Board of Domestic Missions may also again come under review.

ON FRIDAY, the 1st inst., in Trinity Church, Covington, Ky., the Rt. Rev. B. B. Smith, Bishop of the Diocesa, admitted to the Holy Order of Priests the Rev. T. N. Ralston, D. D., and the Rev. F. S. Havens. Dr. Ralston was formerly connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is now in charge of the Episcopal Church in Covington. Mr. Havens was formerly connected with the Reformers (Campbellites), and is now in charge of the Episcopal Church in Mt. Sterling.

LATE ACCOUNTS from China represent that the rebels have taken the great city of Hankow, 600 miles up the Yang-tse Klang, which Lord Elgin recently visited, and which the Abbe Huc estimated to contain a population of three millions. The rebels still hold the Nankin and an immense territory above it. Still it is not believed they will ultimately be successful in their great object, independence.

A CURIOUS NEW SECT, called Transmigrationists, has lately become numerous in France and Germany. Quite different from the Mormons, their character is highly moral, and their creed Christian, only they include all animals in their idea of universal immortality. They profess to believe that being changed after death into some animal will be their purgatory. In Germany their increase is immense.

THE KIRSON AND PHENIX TRIALS in Ireland lead to the explanation that the object of both these societies is the same—Phœnix being the Southern, Ribbon the Northern name—to wreak vengeance on any obnoxious individual Protestant: an Orangeman in the North, a converted Romanist in the South: and when a favorable moment should arrive, say that of a war with France, to sever Ireland from England, and make it an independent State in which the Pope should reign paramount.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH in Canada is divided into veto and non-veto parties; the one sustaining the right of the Bishops to negative the action of the Church Synods, the other denying such right. The recent election of lay delegates at Quebec and vicinity turned upon this point and considerable excitement was the result. The non-vetoes were generally in a majority.

OF LATE YEARS a valuable legitimate trade with the West coast of Africa has gradually grown up in New York, now threatened to be entirely annihilated, the Journal of Commerce thinks, by the foolish stringency with which some portions of the laws for the suppression of African slave trade are being executed.

THE YIELD OF MAPLE-SUGAR in the Northern part of New Hampshire is immense this season. It is no unusual thing to hear of eight, ten and twelve hundred pounds being made in an ordinary sugar orchard.

ELIAS NEVILLE, Halifax county, North Carolina, is sentenced to be hung for killing the man who attempted to violate his wife, who was far gone in progueney! God forbid!

THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT is determined to sustain the Juarez Government in Mexico, regardless of Miramon, or the British and French ministers.

A STEAMSHIP LINE is soon to be established between Boston and New Orleans, with a capital of $400,000.

COMMERCIAL.

TUESDAY EVENING, May 17, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly raport of the New Orleans Price-Current, anding on the 14th inst.:

Transactions in our market generally have been to but a moderate extent, and some very marked changes have taken place within the week. The European advices, received by the steamers Adelaide and Persia, have caused an almost total suspension of business in our Cotton market, and have unsettled the value of our leading staple so that, for several days past, no reliable quotations could be given. Some considerable lots of Tobacco have been taken; Sugar has remained firm, but Molasses has largely declined within the week. In Western Produce there has been more activity within the last day or two, and prices have somewhat improved for several articles.

The river is gradually receding, and is more than a foot below high water mark.

COTTON.—The European advices by the steamer Adelaide wholly unsettled our market on Tuesday, and the confirmation of her advices on Wednesday, received by the Persia, tended to still further stagnation and depression. The sales of the first three days' barely amounting to 3100 bales—closing upon an unsettled and uncertain market. Since then, there has been no established market, only a few buyers coming forward, with greatly reduced offers, which have been met to a limited extent, the sales of the past three days summing up barely 2700 bales; making a total for the week of only 5,800 bales. Total receipts of the week 9,575, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) are 1,031,292 bales, against 1,486,782 bales. The total exports of the week to 31,099 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 13th inst. 165,104 bales. With respect to prices, we are still without any established or quotable market. The few limited sales that have taken place since the receipt of the Adelaide's advices, have been mostly at a decline of ⅛ to ¼c. per pound, or, say, 10¾ to 10¼ for low Middling and 11 to 11¼ for Middling, but these rates have only been accepted for occasional limited parcels; while offers of 11 to 11⅛c. for Middling, which have been made to a considerable extent within the last day or two, (mostly at the former figure) have been quite generally refused by the principal holders, who seem to have made up their minds to await later European advices, now nearly due, before offering their stocks. Under these circumstances we are unable to resume general quotations, as there is really no general and established market.

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 3,500 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3¾ to 5¼ Common to Good Common 5¼ to 5¾; Fair to Fully Fair 6 to 6¾; Prime to Choice 6¾ to 7¾; Centrifugal and Clarified 7¾ to 8¼; Refined 10 to — cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS.—Quotations are nominal at 8¼ cents for light and 10 to 11¼c. for heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11, good fair 11¾, and fine 12 cents per pound for prime to choice.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

God takes Care of the Pretty Fawns.

Have all the little readers of the Advocate ever seen a fawn, or young deer? How innocent the beautiful creatures look, with their spotted coats and large brown eyes, and quickly-moving ears! An old Canadian hunter declares that the reason why the wild deer were not all killed when young (as they breed once a year, and are always surrounded by other animals which prey upon them—as dogs, wolves, bears, panthers, etc.) is, that "no dog or other animal can smell the track of a doe or fawn, while the latter is too young to take care of itself. He stated that he had often seen it demonstrated. He had taken his dogs over the ground where he had just before seen them pass, and they would take no notice of the track, and could not be induced to follow when taken to the spot, while they would instantly discover the track of any deer not having young ones. This is but one proof of the adaptation of the natural laws to preserve life when it most needs protection.

Jamie and Willie.

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS: I want to write you something about a sweet little girl; her name was Jane Ellen McConaghy. She lived with her parents, in Whistler, Alabama. She was an only daughter; and died on Thursday, the 22d of April, in the 8th year of her age, of scarlet fever.

Little Janie was very pretty; I have often seen her in her gleeful moments fling back with her head her beautiful tresses of hair, that seemed to cling to her face as if in love with her smiles and pretty dimples.

She was a good Sunday-school scholar, and a regular hearer of the word of life. She loved her Catechism and Hymn-book, and would often sit down at home in some quiet corner, to learn pretty hymns. Many places in her little reading-book were marked with a pencil or her finger nail. Here is one of them—"We should be like the rose; we must strive to gain a place in the bloom of youth which will live when we are dead, and be dear to our friends and all who have known us."

Janie was like the rose, for she was sweet in her words, her temper, and in her obedience. She often cheered her pastor by her smiles and pretty ways. Little children can do their pastors good if they will.

Here is another, that she marked with her tiny finger nail—

"O, let thy spirit rest on me,
And make me all I ought to be.
Be with me as I grow in years,
And guide me through this vale of tears."

And does the Spirit of the Lord rest on children? Yes, good children; it rested on Janie's little heart, and when she was very sick, she said—"Jesus died for me." She called her parents to her bed, and embraced them three times; she then sent for all the servants and some of her play-mates, and embraced them with tender love; soon after that, her angel came down from heaven and kissed her spirit away to the bosom of Jesus.

It was hard for her parents to part with their sweet child. But they were Christians, and grace enabled them to say—"It is the Lord, let him do as seemeth to him right."

But these parents had not yet drunk the cup of affliction to its very dregs. Three days afterwards Janie's brother Willie died; he was the only brother, just eight months old.

Thus have these only earthly pledges of their love been plucked from their bosoms, like two fresh roses from the valley of Sharon. But the parents still rejoice, because these flowers are now opening and expanding under the sunshine of the smile of Jesus, in the garden of Paradise. They are not childless then—their children are in heaven. I heard them say, "We will soon join them in the skies."

May all my young readers be good children, that they too may form a part of these millions, who compose the family above.

Singular Scene in a Church.

The following novel incident occurred at Pleasant Valley, (Berkhamsted) on Sunday afternoon, 28th March. A preacher from some other town had been expected to hold forth in the Baptist church, the audience were gathered and the preacher arose. After announcing his text he proceeded with his sermon, but had not gone far when he said to the astonished audience:

"I have been instructed not to preach any thing on Abolitionism or Republicanism—but I must serve my master, and I ——"

At this juncture, Deacon Doolittle rose, and said—"Hold on; its my impression that you have said enough. (Turning to the audience) "Meeting is out."

The audience rose simultaneously, and taking their hats went out. The minister sat down, when Deacon Doolittle went to the pulpit and said to him—"If you want to preach politics, I have no objection; and my house is at your service. But this church is not the proper place, and it cannot be permitted. If you desire to give a political sermon or speech, you can do so at my house or at any other place, and I will warrant a good audience, and you shall have fair play and not be hurt. But you must not attempt it in this church."

There was no more preaching in that church that afternoon. These are the facts, as related by persons who were in the audience when the scene took place.

How the Old North State was Done out of her Copper Mines.

Looking along the boundary, between North Carolina and Tennessee, it will be seen that the line, after pursuing a general southwest course for nearly the whole way, suddenly bends directly south as it approaches the Georgia border. Now this line should have kept on southwest, as it started, but the boundary commissioners being so near the close of their labors, resolved, it is said, to indulge in a general "spree," in the course of which the Carolinians got gloriously inebriated, and their Tennessee confreres amused themselves by changing the line, and cheating them out of a small corner. It was considered a capital joke at the time, on both sides, for the land "stands on its edge," and appears to be of that description that makes a man poorer the more he has of it. But it has lately been found to be no joke, as far as "Old Rip" is concerned, at any rate, for this very corner has within it the great copper deposit of Ducktown, which contains immense and inexhaustible beds of that valuable metal.

Mining is in its infancy there, yet the valley already pours out its ores by millions, worth, and constantly increasing every year. In ten years, probably, the market value of this mining region, will be not less than a hundred millions. The line was run about fifty years ago, and North Carolina is barred by the statute of limitation from reclamation. The "mountain dew" was decidedly unwholesome that time for the good old State.

Done Back to Her Negro.

The Indiana girl, whose elopement from Pontiac with the negro Joe sometime since caused considerable talk, is now in Canada living with him, having again deserted her home and friends. On the occasion of her former elopement, her father and brother reclaimed her with difficulty and took her to Indiana, where a divorce was obtained. She went home with them and remained until last week, when she again left, with or without the consent of her parents, and came to Detroit. Crossing the river she found Joe, and they were speedily married for the second time, and are now living in connubial happiness, Joe having sold his horse and cart and bought some furniture with the proceeds.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

A PLEASANT LETTER.

Several months since we received a letter from a lady whom we have never seen, and make some extracts from it. We know not, how the paper came to be marked "For You." The letter was not written for publication. The writer says:

"I see so many of the ladies are writing for the "Advocate," may I not write a few lines to the editor? I know I am not capable of writing for the public eye, yet I know that one who delights so much to talk with the children will take time to run over these few lines. I want to thank you for writing such good lessons for my little Eugenia every week. She has never gone to school but four days in her life; yet I have taught her to read, and every Wednesday, (for it never fails) when the Advocate comes, she is the first to take off the envelop and hunt out "Ma's," and turn eagerly to the "Children's Column." She has many of them carefully filed away and has read them so often that she can nearly repeat them from memory. With great triumph she repeats the story of the little "Catholic Girl."

"I attend to the mail. Not long since, an "Advocate" came, marked "For You." I was in the office alone; I looked a moment at it, and thought I understood its meaning. I dropped on my knees and asked God to direct me in its bestowal, and that it might prove an instrument of good. I kept it about a week, each day watching, when a middle-aged man came that I felt was the one the paper belonged to. He said that he did not take a paper. I have not heard from him since, as he lives about fifteen miles off. It was a good spirit that put it in your heart to put "For You," on that extra paper.

"The Mission here was left to be supplied—and we have had no preacher yet. O, it has been so long since I heard a sermon, or even a prayer—save my own feeble petitions. I have heard but little preaching since I have lived in the piney woods of Louisiana. I often think of the many sermons I heard in childhood in my native home, Kentucky; some of them from my now sainted Papa—for he, too, was a Methodist Itinerant.

"Before long I want to send to the city for the Autobiography of Peter Cartwright, who was an intimate friend of Papa.

"I know you dislike lengthy epistles, and I will stop for the present; but, if I can get any subscribers for the Advocate, I may write again."

"JUST AS I AM."

A poor little boy came to a missionary and holding up a dirty and worn-out bit of printed paper, said, "please, sir, father sent me to get a clean paper like that." Taking it from his hand, the missionary unfolded it, and found that it was a page containing that precious lyrical epitome of the Gospel, of which the first stanza is as follows:

"Just as I am, without one plea,
Save that thy blood was shed for me,
And that thou bidd'st me come to thee—
O Lamb of God!—I come."

The missionary looked down with interest into the face earnestly upturned to him, and asked the little boy where he got it, and why he wanted a clean one. "We found it sir," said he, "in sister's pocket, after she died, and she used to sing it all the time while she was sick, and she loved it so much that father wanted to get a clean one, and put it in a frame to hang it up. Won't you please to give us a clean one, sir?"

This little page, with a single hymn on it, had been cast upon the air, like a falling leaf, by Christian hands, humbly hoping to do some possible good. In some little Mission Sabbath-school, probably, this poor girl had thoughtlessly received it, afterwards to find in it, we may hope, the Gospel of her salvation. Could she, in any probability, have gone down into death, sweetly singing that hymn of penitence and faith in Jesus, to her latest breath, without the saving knowledge of him which the Holy Spirit alone imparts?

The incident was so impressive that it was related in a Sabbath-school, subsequently, and copies of the same beautiful hymn were given to all who would promise to learn it. Groups of children from such schools have since been seen repeating or singing it. None can tell what these simple lines have done, or are destined to do for the salvation of the lost.

AN OLD MAN'S ADVICE.

The Rev. Daniel Waldo, late Chapiain to Congress, says: "I am now an old man, I have seen nearly a century. Do you want to know how to grow old slowly and happily? Let me tell you. Always eat slowly—masticate well. Go to your food, to your rest, to your occupation smiling. Keep a good nature and a soft temper everywhere. Never give way to anger. Cultivate a good memory, and to do this you must always be communicative; repeat what you have read; talk about it. Dr. Johnson's great memory was owing to his communicativeness. You young men who are just leaving college, let me advise you to choose a profession in which you can exercise your talent the best, and at the same time be honest."

NOT YET.

If the great tempter can only persuade men to postpone attention to personal religion he is quite satisfied with his success. The conscience quieted by the promise of future effort, ceases to give trouble; and the delay, in numberless instances, proves fatal. Immediate decision, followed by immediate action, is the only safety for a burdened soul. The following incident records the spiritual history of thousands:

"Not yet," said a little boy, as he was busy with his trap; "when I grow older I will think about my soul."

The little boy grew to be a young man.

"Not yet," said the young man; "I am now about to enter into trade; when I see my business prosper then I shall have more time than now."

Business did prosper.

"Not yet," said the man of business, "my children must have my care; when they are settled in life, I shall be better able to attend to religion."

He lived to be a gray-headed old man.

"Not yet," still he cried, "I shall have nothing else to do but to pray."

And so he died. He put off to another time what should have been when a child. He lived without God and died without hope.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

W. JUNIUS NASH died at his father's residence, near Pattersonville, La., 30th April, 1859, of congestive fever. He was sick only two days. He was born in Caswell county, N. C., 18th Dec., 1824; came to this State when quite young. In 1847 or '48 he was married to Miss Amelia McKeever, who died eleven months before him. About two years ago he joined the M. E. Church. His life has been consistent with the principles of that church. He leaves two interesting children. He was a devoted son, husband, brother, and friend. To know him, was to love him. We my safely say, from his life, and faith in the gospel of the Son of God, that he is gone to that "rest where the wicked cease from troubling."

REV. W. H. CRENSHAW died at Baton Rouge, La., May 1st, 1859, in his 46th year. He was a native of Sumner county, Tenn. He emigrated to Mississippi where he joined that Conference in 1843. Was early stationed in Baton Rouge, where he remained till his decease. He located, 1 believe, in 1853. He was suddenly called to his account. At ten o'clock he lighted his cigar and smoked; at twelve o'clock he was up, and at nine next morning dead. He had complained for a day or two of constipation of bowels. The Dr. gave him some blue mass—operated well. No one expected his attack—Apoplexy.

H. AVERY.

MRS. MARTHA N. CAMPBELL, wife of James Higginbotham, of Lafayette parish, La., was born April 15th, 1829, died March 7th, 1859, aged nearly 30 years. She had been a member of the M. E. Church, South, about two years, at Vermillionville. She seemed to have a presentiment for some months that her time was short on earth. Her sufferings were great for some weeks, which she bore uncomplainingly; and we trust, and have great reason to hope, that to her, "death was the gate to endless joy." Her last words were trustful and triumphant. THOS. B. WHITE.

No institution in the South or North can offer facilities superior to those possessed by the Centenary Institute. By the large additions which have been made to the buildings within the last year, accommodations are now furnished for one hundred and twenty boarders in the Female College.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorise its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility, Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc, etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstration, Cholcris or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 16, 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrotula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUMNER—A girl of 15 or 16 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep-seated ulcer, and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no Panacea, nor Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, no Secret, but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. J. R. HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov. 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams' Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure, though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold. Very respectfully yours,

C. K. STEVENS.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 18 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician. On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until

GENESIS. III. 1.—DR. CLARKE'S INTERPRETATION.

Man is in a state of sin and misery. By eating the forbidden fruit he brought upon himself and posterity "all our woe." Spiritual darkness was around him, an angry God above him, and an awful doom before him. Not long did the mercy of his Creator leave him in this woful condition. A dim promise soon threw its glimmering rays about him. The head of his foe is to be bruised by the seed of the woman.

Moses gives us an account of the fall, but the whole transaction has been variously interpreted. Some regard it as a strictly literal narration of facts, some regard it as a myth, while others by their interpretation make it really ridiculous. Our intention is to examine the word "nachash" and Dr. Clarke's translation of it. It may not be a matter of much importance to know the size or form of the animal that seduced the woman, but since Moses mentions the animal, we infer that God intended that we should know which one was instrumental in the overthrow of our first parents.

Dr. Clarke rejects the usual interpretation of the term "nachash" and translates "orang-outang." In his criticism he seems to reject the vowels entirely, since he founds a verb, the present noun, and another Chaldee noun, meaning brass. They all have the same consonants, but different vowels, as our words call, cell, expand, expend, and many others. It is a well known fact that originally Hebrew had no vowels, but when it was gradually falling into disuse, men who were well versed in the language invented a system of vowels, which they applied to the text with great success. They knew whether the consonants "nchsh," were to be pronounced "nachash," or "nechash," so they expressed the true pronuncintion by means of vowel signs. The interpreter who rejects these vowels, must in many cases follow tradition or his own fancy. Dr. Clarke in interpreting the present passage, has surrendered himself to his fancy, rejected the vowels, bravely stemmed the current of tradition, and despised the authority of versions and interpreters.

After speaking of the difficulty of the passage, and calling Buxtorf as authority for the three meanings, he refers us to Eccles. x. 11. He says: "the creature called nachash, of whatsoever sort, is compared to the babbler;" surely the nachash will bite without enchantment if a babbler is no better. Let the reader keep this in mind." The learned Doctor very tamely followed Coverdale (whom our translators seem to have followed) in what is certainly a very singular version. The Hebrew of this passage is very clear and it is astonishing that any one should have misunderstood it. By rendering the particle "if," instead of "surely," we will get the true sense of the first part of the verse. The Septuagint, Vulgate and many others render it thus. There was a notion, if not true, yet long current in the East, that serpents may be charmed, and thus rendered harmless. Shuckford says: "It is done every day at Cairo, and has been witnessed by Mr. Land, a most intelligent and reputable English traveller." The verse, when literally translated, would read thus: "If the serpent bite without enchantment, then is there no advantage to the owner of a babbler." The "comparison of the nachash to a babbler," on which the Doctor seems to have laid considerable stress, is founded on a misinterpretation.

His reference to Etymology, we think, is also unfortunate. In the Arabic he finds a word which he acknowledges "is not exactly similar to the Hebrew, though to those who understand both languages the similarity will be striking." Etymology, as critics generally acknowledge, is a very uncertain guide, especially if it lead one into a living language, which is always subject to change. No fact is better established than this: that language is ever changing and expanding to meet the necessities of the growing intellect of man. He brings forward the Arabia words that mean devil and ape, and adds: "Is it not strange that the devil and the ape should have the same name, derived from the same root, and that root so very similar to the word in the text?" Now, reader, compara tha words which the Doctor thought so similar. Khanoos, ape, Khanas, devil, nachash, serpent. Perhaps tha old gentleman's ear was not very nice in distinguishing sounds. Transpositions, it is true, were quite frequent in the Oriental languages, but, since the roots in the Oriental tongues consist of but three consonants, wo should not compare words by transposition, unless we find nt the same time a similarity in signification. Dr. Clarke paid no attention to such a principle in his criticism on the word nachash. It is a most remarkable fact that a man of Dr. C's learning should be willing to rest so important a point of theology on the changing, uncertain etymology of a heathen language.

The Doctor says, "nachash appears to be a sort of general term, confined to no one sense." So far as I know, he stands alone in this strange notion. But he adds farther on: "In all this uncertainty, it is natural for a serious inquirer after truth, to look every where for information." This is certainly a wide field for speculation, and well did he avail himself of it. Who else would have thought of accusing the poor orang-outang of a crime which all ages have charged upon the serpent?

The Greek translators of the Old Testament rendered the term hy a word which certainly means serpent. But Dr. Clarke unceremoniously dismisses the venerable version by saying: "they translated serpent not because this was its fixed determinate meaning in the sacred writings, but because it was the best that occurred to the translators! They do not seem to give themselves much trouble to understand the original." "From the Septuagint therefore, we can expect no light." That, we must confess, is rather cool. But he proceeds thus: "the New Testament writers, who scarcely ever quote the Old Testament, but from the Septuagint translation, and scarcely ever change a word in their quotations, copy this version in the use of this word." The learned Doctor is certainly in error here, as any one may see who will take the trouble to compare the quotions in the New Testament from the Old. These have been collected together by several authors. The reader may find them in Horne's introduction, vol. 1. p. 293, 310. We could give many examples to show that the New Testament writers do change not only words but whole phrases from the Septuagint. They frequently translate directly from the Hebrew, though often they do quote the Septuagint. The great commentator stands here in strange but determined opposition to Paul and John.

Let us now state in as few words as possible why we prefer to render nachash by serpent.

1. The Jewish interpreters understand by this term, a serpent. The versions, so far as we can gather, all give the same. The Lexicographers all give the meaning serpent, and not one gives any countenance to the strange fancy of Dr. Clarke. Gesenius says, it is so called from its hissing; while Fererst thinks, it is so called from its creeping. They agree in the animal designated, but disagree as to the origin of its name.

2. The word occurs thirty-one times in the Old Testament and always means serpent. The idea that the word is a general term is simply absurd. The term designates a particular animal, and if Dr. C. has proved that it means orang-outang in the passage under consideration it has the same meaning in the thirty other passages.—Let us apply it. Num. xxi. 6,—would then read: "And the Lord sent fiery orang-outangs among the people, and they bit the people;" and the eighth verse thus: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Make thee a fiery orang-outang and set it on a pole." Is. xxvii. 1.: In that day the Lord.....shall punish Leviathan, the piercing orang-outang, even Leviathan, that crooked orang-outang." Amos v. 19. "As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him; or went into the house, and leaned his hand up against the wall, and an orang-outang bit him." We see the Doctor's translation does not suit these passages.

3. The New Testament writers use the term often. Paul makes direct reference to the passage in Genesis; "as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtlety." If the serpent was not the animal Moses meant, Paul would have informed us. He was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel and was well skilled in all the learning of the Jews: he would have made the alteration if it had been needed. St. John speaks of "that old serpent called the devil and Satan." Christ applies the term to the Pharisees, to signify their wicked dispositions. "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers." Other passages might be brought forward, but these are sufficient for our purpose. Dr. C., however, would have us believe that the New Testament writers were satisfied to endorse the blunders of the Septuagint.

4. The curse pronounced on the nachash is literally verified only in the serpent. "Thou art cursed above all cattle and above every beast of the field: upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life." Dr. C. says: "on all fours shalt thou go." A singular instance of bending a text to suit a pre-formed notion. Making the nachash go equally "on his hands and feet" would not have rendered it "cursed above all cattle;" for there are countless thousands of animals that go thus. The eating of dirt is not to be taken in a strictly literal sense only. Of the enemies of the church, in Mic. vii. 17, it is said: "They shall lick the dust like the serpent." It is used of deep humiliation, and well points out the helpless condition of the serpent With neither hands nor feet, it is compelled to take its food from the ground, and swallow it covered with dust.

5. Dr. C. says, that the serpent "never did nor never can walk erect." That is more than he could prove. It was humbled when it was made "to go on its belly." What its form may have been we do not know. The whole animal creation felt the consequences of man's transgression, but the nachash more than any other. The instrument of so great a calamity ought to have suffered severely; how much he did suffer we cannot tell.

6. We would appeal to the traditions among heathen nations, as a proof of the correctness of the usual rendering. We find the serpent playing a conspicious part in the religion of several ancient nations. Cadmus brought the traditions of the Deluge into Greece; as also the tradition of the serpent of Paradise, which, at first regarded as oracular, became a symbol—a talisman, and at length a god among the nations." So speaks one who has given much attention to these traditions. They are not without their value; many of them can be clearly traced to sacred sources. Every one who has studied Virgil remembers with what astonishment he read the famous Eclogue in which he assures us the "serpent shall die." But what religion regards the orang-outang?—What tradition connects him with the fall of man?—What feeling points to him as an object of worship?—Dr. Clarke has called this poor creature out of his obscurity, by charging upon him a most disgraceful crime. We think he was mistaken. The plain and obvious meaning of scripture is usually the best; speculation is dangerous and it is always fatal to attempt to bend a passage to suit our pre-formed notions. SKETCH OF REV. DR. JABEZ BUNTING.

Dr. Bunting's Life—His Classical Learning—His general Culture—His Methodist Labors.

Let me refer to the Life of Dr. Bunting, of which I have spoken before, as at this time passing through the press. It will possibly be published by the end of May. This life will show that Dr. Bunting was favored with the advantage of a very first-class education. Those who knew him often wondered how, if not classically trained, he could have acquired that unequalled precision and felicity in the use of words which distinguished him; but yet the original condition of his parents was known to have been poor and his own remarkable modesty prevented him from ever claiming or in any way assuming to possess any learning in the languages. Seldom, indeed, did he quote a phrase or word of Latin or Greek. It now however appears, from his own early records, that he received one of the very best educations, short of a University finishing, which could at the time have been obtained in England. He read extensively (for a boy) in the Latin and Greek classics, and his reading was high as well as extensive. He also went through a very full course of elementary mathematics, including some of the higher branches of elementary Algebra, and an excellent course in Euclid and Geometry. He was also practiced in Latin and English verses, in strict English composition, in the art of reading with due emphasis, and in elocution and recitation. He applied to his studies with great assiduity, was highly successful, having few, if any rivals, and was a favorite both with the master and his school-fellows. His friendship with one of his school-fellows, a son of that very eminent physician and scientific literary leader, Dr. Percival, led, as it is well known, to his introduction to the doctor, and his settlement in his family as his own pupil and amenuensis. This connection completed his training and education, as a disciplined thinker, a steady worker, and a gentleman; and doubtless did better for him—fitted him more aptly and completely for the place which he was afterward to occupy in the Church and in the world—than any University course could have done. At the age of seventeen he was secretary, factotum (often president as well as secretary) of a sort of Young Men's Mutual Improvement Society, which was formed at Manchester, which consisted entirely I believe, of Methodist young men, and which discussed the most interesting and perplexing topics of Christian doctrine, morals, and casuistry, (especially as related to social and political topics,) such as the agitation resulting from the French Revolution had brought up to the surface of even steady. Christian societies in the period of 1796-1799. A number of the essays contributed by young Bunting to this society still remain; a sample of them is, I believe, likely to be given in the forthcoming volume. They are remarkable for maturity of thought and correctness of style, but show nothing of what is generally understood as genius. One of the most interesting documents published, as referring to this period of his life, will, if I am not mistaken, be found to be a letter from young Bunting to his sister, at the time that their father was out of health. It is very long, and contains the most particular directions as to the care, management, and tendance of his father—so full, minute comprehensive, and tender, that they resemble much more the thoughtful and loving directions of a mother, than those of a son only seventeen years of age.

Had Jabez Bunting not decided to enter the Wesleyan ministry, he would, after residing twelve months longer with Dr. Percival, have proceeded to Edinburgh, and probably also to the continent, under the auspices and with the aid of of Dr. Percival, to complete his medical education, and must, in that case, have attained the highest reputation, and made a very large income as a physician. But "what things were gain to him, these he counted loss for Christ." Dr. Percival regretted much the removal of his pupil and friend, but retained his friendship for him to the last, and appointed him, along with his own son, executor under his will. The mutual relations of Dr. Percival and Mr. Bunting were highly creditable to both.

One of the most conspicuous features in the character of young Bunting was the diligence and minute attention with which he studied the sermons of the greatest masters, and the assiduity with which he availed himself of every opportunity, especially after his appointment to London in 1803, of hearing others preach, especially men of fame and power as preachers. He "studied" with eminent zeal and perseverance to show himself a workman that needed not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." He owed not less to methodical, painstaking, unflagging self-culture and self-discipline, than to his great original powers. He was incomparably the best educated and intellectually trained Methodist minister of his day, to begin with, and no one surpassed him in the diligence and energy with which he sought to carry to their utmost height every power and advantage which he possessed. No wonder that such a man, endowed by Providence with such native powers, so quick of perception, so calm and judicial in intellectual temperament, so fervid and intense withal in spirit, should have become almost from the first the foremost man in Methodism.

At the very Conference at which he was ordained, (1803,) Manchester, Liverpool, and London all petitioned to have his services, and only after a long and warm debate, to him exceedingly unpleasant, was it decided, on a division, that he should go to London. After this another proposition was made, that to prevent ill-feeling and altercation between the circuits of Manchester and London, he should be sent to Bath; but to London it was settled that he must go.

The recommendation of the district meeting to which he belonged, that of Macclesfield, had been that he should be sent to Barslem, in the Staffordshire Potteries. It is interesting to note that at this period the preacher's district meetings in England were accustomed to take a certain part in regard to the stationing of the preachers. They prepared a rough sketch for the assistance of their representative in the stationing committee at the ensuing Conference. The same is still done in Ireland. But, in England the pressure of other business needing to be definitively performed, and involving most important interests, has long ago led to the discontinuance of this practice, which could not for fifty years past have been of much use or significance. Our district meetings are now overwhelmed with work, especially such as involves the financial and material interests of the constituent circuits, for the full and satisfactory performance of which they find the utmost limit of time available in many cases insufficient.

No sooner was the newly-ordained minister settled in London than a tide of popularity set in upon him such as had never since Wesley's death welcomed the ministrations of any Methodist preacher. His noble-spirited senior brethren, far from envying their young colleague, arranged that he should preach more frequently than themselves in the principal chapels. His personal modesty, and his cheery yet quiet and entirely gentlemanly manners, seem to have made him a general favorite. Young as he was, his talents were called into requisition in every direction, and on behalf of his fathers in the ministry. Mr. Benson obliged him to revise his own pamphlets for the press, consulted and employed him largely for the magazine, and put the productions of his brethren under his eye and pen; the senior ministers, with Mr. Butterworth, the law publisher, employed his acute intelligence and practiced pen in drawing up statements on behalf of persecuted missionaries for Mr Wilberforce and Lord Castlereagh, and his gentlemanly and self-possessed "habit of society" was made serviceable in personal interviews on such subjects with ministers of State and members of Parliament. Already he was standing near the helm of Methodistic affairs, and acquiring command over the springs of opinion and action. He did not seek this; his greatness was in fact thrust upon him. But at the age of twenty-three or twenty-four he had reached to this position.

Not only within, but beyond Methodism, he was becoming rapidly known and esteemed. From the beginning of his course true catholicity of feeling was one of his marked characteristics; he at all times associated freely both with Episcopal and (still more) with Non-conformist ministers; and many friendships, with the latter class especially, which he formed in his youth, were retained through life.

When Mr. Bunting first went to London he kept a diary. Some of its entries are very amusing. At this time the five o'clock morning preaching was still kept up at the City Road. The two preachers who lived at the City Road House had to officiate each once a fortnight; the other traveling preachers, living far away, were freed from this duty, or, by concert with each other, had determined to free themselves. On the other mornings of the week local preachers came to help out the services. Mr. Taylor (the first Joseph) was Mr. Bunting's superintendent, the two living together, Mr. Bunting as the "young man." The regular number of attendants at this morning preaching, scarcely ever varying, was thirteen. But on the first morning when Mr. Bunting had been announced to preach, that number was swollen to twenty-one. "The man" promised to call the young preacher at half past four, but did not, and so on he slept till half past five. He was up and dressed just in time to count the congregation as they went out. The disappointment, however, was not great, as the people had long been accustomed to such. Mr. Taylor could not scold Jabez for his sleepiness, having been overtaken in the same fault just one week before. When Mr. Lovelace, an old worn-out barrister, had heard that Mr. Bunting was to preach that morning, he had been overjoyed, and had said that "now there would be a revival in London, for that there had been little good done since the morning preaching was discontinued, and that the abandonment of this practice was the true cause of the present war." Twelve days later Mr. Bunting was appointed again to preach at the early service. This time he was up and ready, but found the doors of the house so variously and curiously locked, barred, and chained that he could not, for the life of him, open any of them. So he called through the gates to Dr. Hamilton to begin the service, and after a while, by the help of the service, got out to the people, who mustered the regular number of thirteen before the service closed.—Christian Advocate and Journal's English correspondence.

It is said there are twenty-seven American students at this moment taking advantage of the Medical branch of the Paris University, and a great number of American medical men (especially from the South) profiting by the experience of the hospitals. The University of Paris does not unite its faculties as do those of other countries, and it recognizes but three instead of four. The three are theology, jurisprudence, and medicine. There are 7000 students altogether learning in their several departments.

BOOK AND TRACT SOCIETY AND DEPOSITORY OF THE MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: I regret that I feel it to be my duty to give another article in reply to reports put forth and kept moving in reference to this Society and Depository.

1. It has been industriously circulated that the "Book and Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference, has no sort of connection with the Mississippi Conference," consequently, the Depository has none—is an outsider, something sucking the life-blood from the Mississippi Conference. It has been called "a trick."

"No sort of connection with the Mississippi Conference?" That is strange. Let us look at facts a little.

At the session of Mississippi Conference held at Jackson, La., in November 1854, the Constitution of the Tract Society was adopted by a vote of the Mississippi Conference; and its first officers and Board of Managers elected by a vote of the Mississippi Conference on the same day. The Constitution provides that, persons may become members of the Society for one year, by paying one dollar; and for life, by paying ten dollars at one time. No one is a member of the Tract Society by virtue of his being a member of the Mississippi Conference, any more than he is of the Missionary or Preacher's Aid Society. It takes money to make any one a member of either of these Societies.

The Constitution also provides, that it may be altered or amended at an annual meeting of the Society by a majority of its members present and voting. Hence, at the annual meeting of the Society in November, 1855, it was so altered as to be called "The Book and Tract Society," etc. An Agent was appointed to travel, etc.

The Charter was obtained under the Constitution, and to enable the Society to carry out the letter and more readily the objects of the Society. It was never dreamed that the Charter was putting us outside of our relation to, or removing us from the Conference.

It says: "All persons becoming share-holders in, or donors to the Society, shall be members of the corporation according to the regulations of the Society." Ask what "Society?" The Book and Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference. Ask, what "regulations?" Those I mentioned above. So convinced were we that we were acting according to the Constitution adopted by a vote of the Mississippi Conference, that we have been governed by its regulations or provisions in our elections of officers and managers—electing annual members as well as share-holders, to both.

"It has no connection with the Mississippi Conference." Yet the Conference adopts a resolution requesting the Bishops to appoint brother Abbey, Agent; again, to appoint brother Montgomery, Agent; brother Merrill, Agent of the Book and Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference. More: The last session of the Conference adopted the following resolution, viz: "That it is expedient and proper that the Book and Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference should sustain, as nearly as may be consistent and practicable, the same relation to, and have the same interest in the Publishing House at Nashville, as the Book and Tract Societies of the other Conferences."

And, yet more: The Mississippi Conference nominates twelve of its members, of whom the members of the Book and Tract Society elect, by ballot—six managers; also twelve laymen, of whom the Society, by ballot, elects six managers.

Yet, it is industriously circulated that the Society has no sort of connection with the Conference! I regret to know that a member of the Conference first started the report, and has kept up the cry.

If this Society has no connection with the Conference, the members of the Conference have been most unmercifully gulled from the first vote when its Constitution was adopted down to the last nomination made by vote. Who gulled them? The man who made the first move to elect its first President. The same man has done the mischief in sowing the seeds of discord among the people.

But suppose that the Society was immersed into the Conference—none but members of the Conference were members of the Society, and none attended to its business and interests but members of the Conference: Would not men still have to attend to it all? The Mississippi Conference is composed of men and not of angels or super-human beings.

But to conclude on this report. The Book and Tract Society sustains a more intimate relation to the Conference than the Missionary Society.

Yet the people have been sending from $8000 to $13,000 as Missionary contributions annually since my connection with Mississippi Conference.

Did any one ever object to giving money for the Missionary cause, because the Society was not in the Conference—not controlled by the Conference?

Suppose, that the first time and every time some good brother attempts to take up a Missionary collection the people rise up, and say: "Mr. preacher, we can't give to this Society and cause, because the Society is not under the control of the Mississippi Conference." The whites of his eyes would show largely, and he would affirm, and affirm. But he can't make the tenth part of a showing that we can about the Book and Tract Society.

If this Book and Tract Society sustains a nearer relation to the Conference than the "Preachers Aid Society of the Mississippi Conference," yet no one ever dreamed of opposing old brother Owens on that ground, when he was agent, collecting funds, etc.

Will any one now dare say, that the Book and Tract Society has no connection with the Mississippi Conference?

Will any one object to our operations, when he learns that our object is to do good by "buying and selling and distributing gratuitously, good moral and religious literature." Will any one object to taking part in this good cause?

How many could send us by mail $5, $10, $20, $25, or $50, or $100, to be used in this good work. If some one would pay for them, I could send $500 worth of books and tracts and catechisms to poor neighborhoods for Sunday-school children and grown up people. Will not some good brother or sister, or both or more, send me something of the means which they have to help me to send these books and tracts to the poor? You may designate the neighborhood or county where they shall be distributed in part or in whole. I hope there will be several prompt and liberal responses to this call or suggestion.

2. It is circulated: "That the Bible brought out is a catch-penny thing not worth five dollars."

Now, that any sane person should put forth such a report is passing strange.

If I could believe that he was non compos, I should have more charity for him. From what the Bible has cost I know that it could not be bought in the book stores at less than $35—with extra gilt, etc. $40, to $50.

How much better it would be for all to come up to our assistance! How much better it would be for those who have given their notes to pay up and send their money on a good mission, than to be hunting for excuses, making insinuations that what they give will all be squandered—as if they would have no interest in, or connection with the Society, and had no right as individuals to look after its interests. Every share-holder should regard himself as the special agent of the interests of the Society and Depository—encouraging all to be united in the work. The Share-holders can keep it moving, or ..... It is their interest. The officers and Managers superintend the special business and finances of the Depository without pecuniary remuneration, all for the good of the Cause.

Allow me to urge the preachers to send orders for the books, and sell them to the people. Your congregations will increase; you will have awakenings and conversions, and additions to the Church as the result.

The intelligence and piety of the members of the Church will be greatly increased by pursuing this course. I know what I say, having demonstrated it already.

Our object is to do good—only good. And if I did not believe that it was a legitimate way of doing good it would not be Agent another day. Nor would I be an Agent in this cause now, if I did not believe we were getting on foot a plan, that, in years to come, will result in great good to this country and the Church, the fruits of which will be manifest when the present laborers will have passed away to the home above. O, how every preacher should use every means to do the most good. A good tract, pamphlet or book, will speak when you are gone, and work silently but surely in the mind, so as to result in salvation.

Come, my brother, dont excuse yourself because there will be a little trouble and expense—sacrifice. How great the sacrifice already made for the world's redemption and salvation. The sacrifice required of you is small when compared to that. "To do good, and to communicate forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." St. Paul. "Be not weary in well doing." Do.

BAREFOOT ZION TRAVELERS.

Mr. Editor: We have not a few of the above class of Christians in our midst; whose cases give [us not a little uneasiness; and we would be very glad to have their condition improved, and their chances for success at least increased. Can not you do something for them? But, that you may not more understandingly, we will describe their cases more fully.

Not being "shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace," the other portions of the Christian armor do not fit well, nor is it of much service to them—often it is actually in their way. "The girdle of truth" fits so loosely that it affords no strength to the loins, and is cumbrous to them when pursuing the crooked paths they make for their feet. And "the breast-plate of righteousness" has been so battered and torn in these crooked and thorny paths that it affords no real protection to the most vital part, the heart, for it has been pierced by the fiery darts of the enemy and is bleeding at every pore. And the "shield of faith" is so unwieldy, and the hand that holds it is so weak, that very few attempts are made to use it, and only on extraordinary occasions is it used at all. But great use is made of the human tempered helmet, somehow or other. And far the life of them, they cannot tell how they expect to go to heaven. Notwithstanding all their weakness and imperfections, and the crooked paths they have made for their feet, somehow or other they hope to make the peaceful shore at last. So sanguine are they on this subject, that they conclude, though they do not pursue all the length of the celestial road, that they will get near enough the celestial city, that by ons tremendous leap the happy shore shall be gained, and all will be safe at last.

What do you think of this leap, Mr. Editor? You are accustomed to accompany Zion travelers in their journeyings, and to see them off for tha better land—do you think tha chances of this leap are good, and will do to rely upon? A word from you at this point may be of service to some.

Another prominent symptom in the cases of these barefoot ones is, that the gospel NERVE is very weak—so weak and poor, that the least exposure in the service of God is terrible in its effects upon them; can't stand the least fatigue in church-going; damp or night atmosphere is almost fatal; the sun or heat, about as bad; but should the weather be fine, and the unfortunates enter Zion's gates once more—alas, for them, still!—the hard benches and the singing, or, shafts of God's truth that fly barbed by God's Spirit to their guilty consciences from the faithful minister, make a perfect smash of their gospel nerves again. And, may be, for the next three months they are too infirm to repair to the sanctuary of the Lord.

Mr. Editor do you not think that if these unfortunate ones were to get some good gospel shoes, and wear them regularly, daily—not only during the big meeting or when the Bishop or some D.D. comes to town, but all the time—that it would improve their nervous system very much—I mean, Gospel nervous system. As to their other nervous system that appears to be perfectly sound. There is nothing the matter with their vanity nerve, nor their pleasure nerve, nor their mammon nerve—nothing at all—all sound, attuned to their peculiar interests. There are brothers, H. and K., though their gospel nerves are so weak, their mammon nerve is a full match for the greatest toil and the severest weather. And there are sisters A. and Z., always able to get to tha postoffice when Godey or Graham is expected. And if you will ask the clerks of our fashionable stores after the health of these ladies, they will tell you "We are at the first of their being sick or infirm; they are among our most frequent visitors." And there are those other sisters and brothers, who attended the circus the other day and night, to see the elephant stand on his head, and those fast riders in the way of sin and folly jump and skip on in the way of death. One of them has been to church once in the last six months, and went home sick; and others, not much oftener. No bad effects are known to have resulted from the crowd, excitement and exposure of the circus.

O, for good gospel shoes for these poor barefoot Zion travelers! You know, Mr. Editor, that our health depends greatly upon our being duly shod; and when properly shod we are prepared to either walk or run on in the heavenly way. Would you not like to see those weak and feeble ones, now barefoot and out of the way, all properly harnessed [and with eager strides pursuing the heavenly road. I am sure you would, angels would rejoice at the sight.

Unless something better is done for these dear ones of ours, I fear we will have to raise money and buy an elephant and a monkey even, to get them along in Zion's way. Now if we can get people to go in heaven by buying an elephant, had we not better do it?—Is not the soul of a good sister or brother worth more than the price of an elephant? Certainly. Who then will object?

Do settle this question, Mr. Editor; and be sure to so settle it, that the people may be saved. Amen.

WESTERN VIRGINIA CORRESPONDENCE.

Beverly, May 5th 1859.

Mr. Editor: I wish to give you some account of this valley, and particularly this point. If you will take the map, sir, and look for Randolph county, in Western Virginia, you will perceive the county seat to be Beverly. If you will then observe the streams and water courses you will see that they flow from this point to the Gulf, and also to the Atlantic ocean. Hence, you can easily infer that this point is very much elevated above the level of tide-water. There are many things to make it desirable as a place of Summer resort. Deer and bears are found in the mountains. The lands are valuable, offering perhaps a better opportunity for persons to settle in this valley, in desirable situations and at moderate prices, than any point I am acquainted with. Pure and delicious water is abundant. There are facilities for rearing cattle not found in all places. Indeed the main business of this peaceful region now is, grazing. Col. Benton, a prominent gentleman, formerly of Winchester, Va., told me that he knew none better. He resides in the valley, in a pleasant country seat. If, sir, it would suit you to make a visit here this season, you could judge for yourself.

I think, sir, that many of your citizens would find it much to their interest to take this point in their Summer tours.

We have alum water, said to be as good as the famous Alum water of Rockbridge county, in this State. But my particular boast is, the pure water. S. L. O.

THE VOICE OF THE OCEAN.

Was it the sound of the distant surf that was in mine ear, or the low moan of the breeze, as it crept through the neighboring wood? O, that hoarse voice of ocean, never silent since time first began—where has it not been uttered? There is stillness amid the calm of the arid and rainless desert, where no spring rises, and no streamlet flows; and the long caravan plies its weary march amid the blinding glare of the sand, and the red, unshaded rays of the fierce sun. But once and again, and yet again, has the roar of the ocean been there. It is his sand that the winds heap up; and it is the skeleton remains of his vassals—shells and fish, and the stony coral—that the rocks underneath inclose. There is silence on the tall mountain peak, with its glittering mantle of snow, where the panting lungs labor to inhale the thin, bleak air—where no insect murmurs, and no bird flies, and where the eye wandere over multitudinous hill-tops that lie far beneath, and vast dark forests that sweep on to the distant horizon, and along long hollow valleys where the great rivers begin. And yet once and again, has the roar of ocean been there. The effigies of his more ancient denizens we find sculptured on the crags, where they jut from beneath the ice into the mist wreath; and his later beaches, stage beyond stage, terrace the descending slopes. Where has the great destroyer not been—the devourer of continents—the blue foaming dragon, whose vocation is to eat up the land? His ice-floes have alike furrowed the flat steppes of Siberia, and the rocky flanks of Schehallian; and his nummulites and fish lie imbedded in great stones of the pyramids, hewn in the times of the Pharaohs, and in rocky folds of Lebanon, still untouched by the tool. So long as ocean exists, there must be disintegration, dilapidation, change; and should the time ever arrive when the elevatory agencies, motionless and chill, shall sleep within their profound depth, to awaken no more—and should the sea still continue to impel its currents, and to roll its waves—every continent and island would at length disappear, and again, as of old, "when the fountains of the great deep were broken up,"

"A shoreless ocean tumble round the globe."

Was it with reference to this principle, so recently recognized, that we are expressly told in the Apocalypse respecting the renovated earth, in which the state of things shall be fixed and eternal, that there shall be no more sea?" or are we to regard the revelation as the mere hieroglyphic—the pictured shape—of some analogous moral truth? "Reasoning from what we know"—and what else remains to us?—an earth without a sea would be an earth without rain, without vegetation, without life—a dead and doleful planet of waste places, such as the telescope reveals to us in the moon. And yet the ocean does seem peculiarly a creature of time—of all the great agents of vicissitude and change, the most influential and untiring; and to a state in which there shall be no vicissitude and no change—in which the earthquake shall not heave from beneath, nor the mountains wear down, and the continents melt away—it seems inevitably necessary that there should be "no more sea." Hugh Miller.

APOSTASY AND TEARS.

The Rev. Andrew Fuller's preaching was always Scriptural, judicious, and on some occasions pathetic and solemn beyond description. A minister in whom he had once placed entire confidence, and with whom he had for a long series of years been very intimate, fell into awful public sin, and threw a blasting mildew over religion throughout an extensive community. In the very midst of the intense excitement created by the sad event, came the season for a public meeting of ministers annually held in connection with that Church. Some of the neighboring clergymen proposed the omission of the services on account of the state of the public mind, but to this arrangement Mr. Fuller very decidedly objected. The usual season was held, and Mr. Fuller himself appointed to preach. A vast crowd assembled, expecting, of course, some allusion to his former friend; nor were they disappointed. The sermon was on the sins of professors of religion—their frequency, causes, and awful results. His feelings throughout were very tender, and many of his hearers, both clergy and laity, were, during most of the sermon, in tears. He, however, restrained his emotions within bounds till he approached the close of the sermon. Then addressing the unconverted part of his audience, he besought them not to become hardened in their guilt, or neglect the salvation of their souls, because some who had borne "the vessels of the Lord" had sinned. "I need not," he added, with great tenderness of spirit, "make a more distinct reference; but oh, remember that if I, and these my brethren in the ministry, and every other professing Christian in the world, were to make shipwreck of faith and character and to fall into crime like poor———, religion would be still the same grand system of truth and morality, and you would be eternally lost if you rejected it. The Lord Jesus Christ is the standard of character, and not poor sinners like us."

ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS.

The editor of the S. C. Advocate acknowledges the receipt of one hundred dollars, from some unknown donor in Charleston, to be equally divided between Domestic and Foreign Missions. The donor writes: "If God prospers me, I hope to be able to give this or more annually. Not being a member of your church, I send it through you, because I have every confidence that you will see the money applied as requested." In the name of our Church, we thank the giver and wish him every possible blessing.

THE GREAT OPEN FIELD.

You remember the words of our Lord, viz: "The field is the world." These are wonderful words, whether viewed in the language of Jesus, or in their immediate and universal application to the scheme of Christianity as a religion for the world. Had Jesus Christ been a mere Jew, he could never have uttered such a sentiment. Judea would have been his field, and Jews the object of his ministry. But while he was of Jewish blood and Jewish connections, the manhood of his nature transcended all local and national limits, and hence, in his modes of thinking, working, loving, he rises infinitely superior to all Jewish trammels and asserts his one-ness—his entire one-ness—with Adam's race.

His religion, being like himself, the expression of a divine nature and designed for the good of all mankind, shakes the pillars of universality. Founded in no local facts, consulting no prejudices of caste and race, representing no peculiarities of one age or another, it is God's power for God's world.

But there is yet another sense in which the field is the world. Wherever the world has a moral or social interest—wherever it connects itself with man's spiritual welfare—there christianity has its field, there its workmen are to labor, there Christ's authority is to be set up and men called to submit to its rule. Not only are we to make people religious, but we are to put them in the way of becoming religious. For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. This fulness we are to seek for in the Lord's Christ. It has all been redeemed by him and for him. It is his—not Satan's, not the world's; and men are to be taught that they have no moral right to use or to enjoy any thing whatsoever, except as the property of Christ, loaned to them in stewardship, and returnable to the Divine owner.

Our teaching and our living are sadly defective just here. God's claims are unrighteously abated. His honor is compromised—his authority enfeebled. If personal dedication is a duty, then, entire dedication is a duty. The whole heart, the whole life, and the whole service of our days, belong to God. For, depend upon it, a man is not trained and perfected in religious experience by this duty or that. Not by one work nor by another work is he developed into the measure of the fulness of Christ. But by means of all work, by the agency of all duties, is he disciplined into the beauty and strength of a sanctified discipleship. A Christian life is, therefore, a broad life, embracing far more than our [illegible] notions are; and in consequence of its very [illegible] a scope and a depth that we [illegible] often [illegible] should we preach the gospel? Not preach this or that principle—not urge this or that precept—but all. How should we practice it? In its wholeness—as a religion for every thought and word and act—as a religion for every relation and tie—as a religion for each moment and for entire life.

Church action needs the same amplitude. The worst of evils is this narrowness, this fatal heresy, that keeps us within limits which ought to be burst asunder. For it is not the office of the Church to do a few things well, but to do all its work, and to do it in the best possible manner. And this is the spirit needed to ennoble our work. Certain it is, that every addition we make to our fields of labor—every new sphere we occupy—qualifies us that much better to accomplish our task even in those offices which have engaged our attention. Certain it is, if we put more religion into Literature, into Education, into business, we shall preach better and be better in everything. And it is just because we are restrained and confined, that we are weak and ineffective. And until we learn to do our whole duty, we shall do nothing as it ought to be done. The measure of Christian manhood is the breadth of its sympathies; and until our hearts are large enough to embrace the whole world, holding it as Christ's redeemed inheritance, we may be sure that they are not the hearts which God asks us to give to Him and to His blessed service.

[illegible] OF THE PUBLISHING HOUSE.

[illegible] Baker sends us the following, containing Dr. [illegible]'s explanation, and Dr. McTyeire's comment, in reference to the relation of the Genealogical Bible to the Endowment of the Publishing-house. He requests its publication. We had intended to publish the [illegible], but, at Mr. Baker's request, we publish the [illegible] also. Let the "free cash capital" be raised. The [illegible] that succeeds best in doing this, is the best plan. If the "Bible" helps, so be it. If others wish to help without the "Bible," so be it also. The raising of the "capital" is the end in view. Let Conferences and individuals exercise all freedom of opinion as to the "plan," but let all be harmonious as to the "capital." Such has been the [illegible] this paper has taken from the beginning. Let us all pull together, whatever diversity of plan we may have in our unity of aim.

"THE GENEALOGICAL FAMILY BIBLE."—For a clear understanding of the relation "the Genealogical Family Bible" sustains to the plan of raising an active capital for the Southern Methodist Publishing-house, it is deemed proper that a few facts should be stated.

The Bible, as a certificate of Perpetual Membership, in the Mississippi Conference Book and Tract Society, was suggested by the Rev. Richard Abbey, when he was the Agent of that Society. He had, before the General Conference in 1858, made in part his arrangements for its publication, and the work was in progress. After his election as Financial Secretary, having conferred with friends and the Book Committee, it was determined to incorporate the Bible in the plan recommended to the Annual Conferences. Brother Abbey accordingly went forward with the Bible. When specimen copies were brought out, exceptions were taken by some to the fact that the copyright was in the name of Richard Abbey, and that it had not the imprint of the Southern Methodist Publishing-house in the title-page. Brother Abbey, upon the statement of these exceptions, very readily proposed to remove all the exceptionable features, and has further arranged that so soon as his contract with his publisher is out for the forthcoming edition, he will transfer the plates, copyright and all, to the Book Agent. The copies already in course of publication will be furnished to the Publishing-house at cost, the Financial Secretary not expecting to make any per cent., but to secure the entire profits arising from the sale of the Bible to the Southern Methodist Publishing-house, as provided for in the plan adopted by several of the Annual Conferences. When the plan is matured, it is intended, as Brother Abbey has heretofore published, to have the [illegible] printed at our own establishment, in this city. The proof-sheets of the forthcoming edition are now being carefully read and collated with the Oxford standard edition by Dr. Sansom, the Book Editor.

Nashville, May 23, 1859. J. B. McFERRIN, Agent.

Dr. McTyeire, in commenting on the above, says: So much for the certificate, a mere incident. Let us not lose sight of the principal thing in what ought to be full and presented as incidental. If the Bible were [illegible] orth intrinsically less than it is—we should [illegible], for its purpose. Those who do not want it, [illegible] to its cost in books of our own catalogue. If [illegible] object to the plan on the score of its liberality—[illegible] its certificate is too costly, and its sanction too heavy—this we say: these objections do not lie against the [illegible]. He may generously relinquish all conditions, and make a clean and full offering, if so it please him. [illegible] we hope will be done, where it can be afforded.

And now, brethren, let us to the work, and "perform the doing of it." Meet the Agents—upon whatever scheme their Conference are acting—and meet the Financial Secretary, in his collecting tours, with Southern bounty and Christian generosity. Our Church must have this endowment to meet the demands for abundant and cheap religious publications.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

We publish below a copy of a letter from our missionary in China, from the Mississippi Conference, Rev. J. W. Lambuth. Some things in it apparently reflect on the Missionary Secretary, but we have no doubt it is some kind of a mistake that can be rectified. At any rate, we are bound to suffer our missionaries in that far-off land to speak to their friends and the church through the columns of the Advocate. They are open to the Missionary Secretary also. This matter must be explained and corrected. The Mississippi Conference will not suffer a continuance of such things. Much feeling existed at the last session in consequence of similar statements. If a full showing is not made at their next session, they will, we know, take steps to guard against any thing of the kind for the future. Mississippi will raise any amount of money necessary for her China mission, but she must have a guarantee that it will reach its destination. But the letter speaks for itself. It is dated Shanghai, Feb. 17, 1859, and written to Rev. John R. Lambuth, the venerable father of the missionary.

MY DEAR FATHER:—I would have written to you by last mail had I not felt so unwell, having had an attack of dysentery, a disease to which all foreigners are subject in this empire. I am almost entirely recovered, and am again able to work. How good the Lord is to us! Surely his mercy endureth forever, and his promises are sure to all who trust in him. Mary still keeps well. Walter and Netty, our children, are in good health and growing finely, and I hope, if it be the will of God, I shall be permitted to remain a little longer, to preach the unsearchable riches of the Gospel to this heathen people. I am now able to talk and make myself understood in preaching in the Chinese language. One thing I greatly need, to be able to make any progress in the work, and that is, funds. We have now been five months without any money, only as we could borrow to live on from week to week, that we might have bread to eat. I understood that eight thousand dollars were appropriated by the Board, in May 1858, for the China Mission, but not a dollar has reached us yet. The ensuing May will be the time the Board will make its appropriations for the year beginning October this year. No doubt, he (Dr. Shehon) intends well by retaining the funds, but he is placing us in rather an unpleasant attitude. We have to suspend all operations, when such a delay happens.

The money ought to be forwarded as soon as appropriated, for it requires a considerable length of time to reach us. We cannot conceive the cause of this delay. Would the Mississippi Conference send me my salary, school funds, and funds to print tracts, without placing the money in the hands of the Board, I believe all would go on more smoothly, and the work would prosper. As to the money given to build me a church; I fear it will be delayed until too late for me to use it. If the money is for me to build a church, I should like to have it as soon as possible. Our time at best is but short in this unhealthy climate, and I desire to do all I can for the cause of God, while I am here.

They are having quite a revival at Ningpo, among the natives; many have joined the church within the last month. We have taken another Chinaman into the church, by the name of Hu. We now number twelve at Shanghai, all orderly and acceptable. Brother J. O. Stevens at Jackson stated in a letter to me, that the family had intended to send us a box of articles. We shall welcome it with much joy. I wish Brother Robert was with me, in my labors among the Chinese. We could be of great help to each other in this work. This is Thursday night, and the Chinese are in great terror lest there should be an Eclipse of the Moon. I will finish this letter on Saturday morning for the mail which closes in the afternoon. I am a great deal better, and expect to go into the country for a few days for a change.

Saturday, Feb. 19.—Last night the mails came bringing a letter from you, dated Nov. 22, and also a bill from "Abraham Bell, Sons" in New York, on the house of "John and Edward Corderoy & Co., London," for eighty pounds sterling. I think there will be no difficulty in having it cashed here at sight. I will let you know by next mail, which will be here in about fifteen days, what the result will be. It is decidedly the most speedy and sure way of getting funds from Mississippi. This bill came when we were really in need—as I have stated already in another part of this letter. If you, or any of my friends, or friends of the mission in China, wish to send any money to us, send it in a bill as you have done this, for the Secretary of the Board has so much to attend to, that it causes him to neglect the China Mission. Money has been given by friends to aid us, as we are informed, which has not reached us yet.

I feel grateful to God for his goodness to us since our sojourn in this land. My father, I wish you could see my church; I know my friends would rejoice, in that they have already aided me in paying for it. It is the only church we have in which we, as a mission, can preach. Brothers Cunningham and Jenkins have been compelled to give up their preaching places for the want of funds to pay the rent. Had I not gone to work and with the aid of two friends put up this house of worship, we should have been without a place to preach, except in the open street. But now I have a house and a piece of ground for, which I have a title. I value it at a thousand dollars; it is worth more than that to us as a mission. I hope to be able some day not far in the future to get other places of preaching in some of the large cities not far from Shanghai. I am taking up a native subscription from our membership for the purpose of building a church in Su Chow, eighty miles from Shanghai. With the money given by my Conference to build a church in China, I can build two respectably large houses in two large cities. I hope the funds will be forwarded without delay.

I am improving every day in health. It will soon be five years since I left my native land. I have now a Chinese boy of twelve years of age, to send by the first opportunity to be educated at "Centenary College, Louisiana." He is a very smart boy, and is now learning very fast. He was given to me, and I have named him Charley K. Marshall. He recites a lesson to me every day, and is learning the alphabet. He is my boy, so I have concluded to send him to my native land to be educated. I want to send two boys of the same age; the other I expect to name after you. I know Brother Marshall would take great interest in him, if he could see him, for I believe he will make an intelligent man. I will write to President Miller about it; and know what arrangements can be made to get them both from New York to Jackson, La. Missionaries are going home frequently, and would be glad to take them as far as New York for their services aboard the ship. I am preparing a letter for Brother Marshall, which I hope to send by next mail. Pray for us, dear father, that God would smile upon us in our work. Give our love to all at home, white and black, and to all friends. J. W. LAMBUTH.

REV. DR. MCTYEIRE, of the Nashville Christian Advocate, is on a visit to New York, attending the Bible Society anniversary. We see a brief report of his speech on that occasion in the New York Spectator.

REV. GEORGE LANE, well known as former senior Book Agent at New York, is dead. He was a venerable and venerated man.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ANNIVERSARY, MOBILE.

Mobile, May 19th, 1859.

MR. EDITOR.—Fearing you may not receive a more full account than the enclosed, published in one of our city papers, relative to our great "Methodist Sunday School Union" celebration, which took place last Saturday, I send it to you to make such use of it, as you may deem best.

"The anniversary of the Sunday Schools connected with the M. E. Church—six in number—took place last Saturday, 14th inst. It was an occasion of much interest and enjoyment. The procession, which was formed on St. Francis street, was composed of 800 children, in which was included the children of the Protestant Orphan Asylum, according to invitation. A band of music led the procession; following the music was a beautiful banner, upon which the motto 'Teach it to thy children,' was inscribed in gold characters beneath the representation of a Bible.

"About ten o'clock the procession arrived at Holly's Garden, which was suitably prepared with benches, tables and platform for the occasion.

"Two tables of a hundred yards each were tastefully arrayed with wholesome viands of every description that could tempt the palate and satisfy the appetite. It was estimated that there were about 1200 to 1500 persons in the grove. As soon as the children were all comfortably seated in the shade, the literary exercises were opened with singing by the children, and prayer by the Rev. Mr. Carver; after which the children participated in various dialogues and addresses, which were exceedingly interesting—each inculcating some useful moral, some instructive lesson. The Rev. Mr. Ross closed these exercises with an eloquent address to the pupils, teachers and parents.

"Then followed the feasting—which seemed to be participated in with due appreciation, if we judge from the small amount that was left out of such abundance. The provisions were mostly contributions from the parents interested in the schools. The tables were filled three times.

"The dinner being through, the children were released and allowed to sport in unrestrained enthusiasm and innocent joy on the green sward, beneath the cool shade of the oaks and cedars. Two or three hours were thus spent to the infinite amusement of the young folks.

"It was a day to be remembered as one of the bright ones of their childhood.

"At about half past four the procession reformed, and each school marched back to its respective locality."

All our Methodist schools in Mobile have resolved themselves into a 'Methodist Sunday School Union,' under the Presidency of Jas. Elder Esq., with a view to bringing our united influence to bear with more force in perpetuating the schools now established, and establishing Mission schools in the enburbs of our city, whenever any favorable opening presents. We have already inaugurated two, under very promising prospects, and through the blessing of God and the self-sacrificing labors of those engaged in this 'work and labor of love'—we hope to accomplish much good in redeeming from the bondage of ignorance and vice many of the poor children of our vicinity, who have heretofore been left uncared for, and without any religious culture and training.

To many engaged in Sabbath School labors in our city—(I mean of course, Methodists) it is no small occasion of regret that all the duties pertaining to this most important enterprise of our church is left almost exclusively to the younger portion of our membership—and our efforts and ardor are sometimes dampened by the manifest indifference upon the part of our leading men—our stewards and leaders, the officiary of the church, many of whom, from personal observation, would scarcely ever know it if the teachers should some Sunday disband and abolish the schools altogether. What think you of parents of scholars who never think it worth while, (not even once a year) to visit our schools, and never betray the least concern as to whether they languish or prosper?

The teachers not only have the burden of the labor, but generally have to bear all the expense connected with the successful prosecution of the schools. This is a strong picture, but nevertheless true—and deplorable as true. In the arrangements for this very celebration—intended to give an impetus to the cause—to incite the children to greater diligence, and stimulate others to join our "little army"—some of our most liberal men, on other occasions, refused to give us any assistance, and left us to provide for the entertainment of their own children at our own expense—to say nothing of the labor and trouble incident to it.

We do not write these things in bitterness—but in the hope that it may lead some to think; knowing that reflection is only requisite to satisfy all candid minds that they are without excuse who provide not for the spiritual wants of their own household, even though their enlarged sympathies make liberal demands upon their means to send the "word of life" to the remotest parts of the earth. What will be our gratulations at the great day of Assize, though our crowns of rejoicing be decked with the stars of many souls rescued from heathenish darkness and interminable woe, through our instrumentality—if our own children are "cast out?" We do not encourage and dare not foster the selfish idea that charity should remain at home—but earnestly insist it should begin there. B.

TEXAS CORRESPONDENCE.

Cold Springs.

MR. EDITOR.—It may not be uninteresting to you and your readers, to learn the state of improvement and the encouraging prospects of the M. E. Church South, at this point. That we have a growing and wealthy country, you need not be informed. This circuit has five preaching places, with a wealthy, liberal and intelligent membership.

We have just completed our new and commodious house of worship in the town of Cold Springs. It is what we country people call "a fine church," well finished, and on a beautiful eminence overlooking the town, reminding the worshipers of Mount Zion—"the joy of the whole earth."

Sunday, May 1st, was the one set apart for the Dedication. Rev. Dr. J. E. Scott of Waverly, was invited to preach the sermon. At an early hour the house was filled—Rev. Scott, Kennon and Carden in the pulpit. Dedicatiun hymns and select music, sung by Mr. Gillatt, assisted by the whole congregation. First prayer by the Presiding Elder, Rev. Mr. Kennon. The reading of the prayer of King Solomon, at the Dedication of the Temple, by the preacher in charge. Singing again by Mr. G., which was followed with a scripturally powerful sermon in the Doctor's best style, on the text—"Then Samuel took a stone and set it between Mizpeh and Shur, and called the name of it Ebenezer; saying, hitherto hath the Lord helped us."

In his remarks, he described the wayward youth wandering far from home and from God; and, after years of prodigality, returning to his native town, where the father lies silent in the burying-ground, hard by this building; and once more looks upon these sacred walls dedicated this day to the worship of God, the spire pointing silently to the house of the just above—and remembers, "My Father contributed to the erection of this house, and worshiped the God of his fathers here."—That this might be the means of his awakening and conversion, and that it would preach a more powerful sermon to him than all the eloquent divines he had ever heard.

The effect was electrical, and tears fell like rain from many an eye. I was carried back in memory to the scenes of my boyhood, amid the temple-crowned hills and story-telling glens, and gushing fountains, and bright skies of East Tennessee, where once I heard the eloquent Creed Fulton (now of Georgia) preach an able and effective sermon from the same text, to a large concourse of people.

At the close of the sermon, the Presiding Elder administered the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper to quite a number of communicants, assisted by the ministers present, and we all felt that it was none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven. Long may the God of our Fathers be worshipped in the beauty of holiness here. Amen. YOUR CORRESPONDENT.

THE EUROPEAN WAR.

CESAR crossed the Rubicon, and the Austrians have crossed the Ticino—and the latter seems to be as decisive as the former. War appears to be inevitable. The same decisiveness appears in the manifestos of the respective belligerent governments. First we have the summons of Austria to Sardinia to disarm. Count Buol, in his letter to Count Cavour, requiring an answer in three days, says:

"Such M. le Count, is the object of this letter. I have the honor to beg that your Excellency will give its contents the most serious consideration; and let me know if the Royal Government consents—yes or no—to put without delay its army upon a peace footing and to disband the Italian volunteers."

The proclamation of the King of Sardinia says, in substance:

"The King regards the demand to disarm as an outrage upon himself and nation, and has therefore repelled the demand with disdain. The King calls to mind Italy's cry of anguish, and says: "I will be your captain. I have proved your valor on the field of battle by the side of my illustrious father. This time you will have for your comrades the gallant French soldiers, your companions on the Tchernaya, whom the Emperor has sent to support and defend our just and civilizing cause. Forward to victory! Let our banners announce to you that our object, like our war-cry, is the Independence of Italy!"

The manifesto of Napoleon, among other things, says:

"While on the one side, the cabinet of Vienna persists in not consenting to the admission of the Italian States to the Congress, the meeting of which it thus renders impossible; on the other hand, it demands from Piedmont to place her army on a peace footing, and to disband her volunteers—that is to say, to concede without delay, and to Austria alone, that which it had already granted to the Powers, under the sole reserve of coming to an understanding with them about it."

"In presence of this state of things, if Sardinia is menaced, if, as every thing leads it to be presumed, her territory is invaded, France cannot hesitate to respond to the appeal of a nation her ally, to which she is bound by common interest and traditional sympathies, regenerated by a recent confraternity in arms, and by the union contracted by the two reigning houses."

Of the Russo-French treaties, the London Times says:

"France and Russia have declared that alliance which has long been expected, and which has always been a probability in every European embroilment. Though so often hinted at, and so conformable to the precedents of a century, the intelligence is most startling.

"Lord Cinrendon hit the truth in describing the proposition of Russia as the invitation of one despotic Government to compel a third despotic Government to give its subjects free institutions.

"By the first treaty Russia binds herself, in the event of France being at war with Austria, to assist France by the co-operation of her fleets in the Baltic and the Mediterranean, and moreover to place an army of observation of not less than 50,000, on the Austrian frontier. This is the first treaty, and it is obviously directed immediately against England. France can have nothing to fear from the navy of Austria. If she seeks to strengthen herself at sea, it must be against some first-class naval power, and what other is there than England?

"It may have been foreseen that the intentions of the two allied despots must provoke the resistance of all Germany, and render necessary the blockade of all the ports upon the Baltic; and it may have been considered, that, however peaceable may be the intentions of England, the contemplated impediments upon her Baltic commerce might render her absolute neutrality scarcely possible.

"The second treaty seems to have been suggested by some knowledge or suspicion of the intended action of Austria, for it provides, that, in case Austria should invade Sardinia, Russia shall war against her within fifteen days of her violation of the Piedmontese soil. No union can be closer than that which these treaties create. In the event of Austria invading Sardinia, the two fleets will sail together in the Baltic and in the Mediterranean, and the Army of Observation will occupy Hungary.

"These preparations being made, and all things being ready, it was not to be expected that Austria would be allowed to retire from the position in which her precipitate summons to Piedmont has placed her. Nor on the other hand, would Sardinia herself be permitted to abdicate her dangerous and unprofitable position as the advanced guard of the French army, and the first victim of the newly-developed enterprise. Recent circumstances would appear to argue that Austria was not thoroughly well-informed of the alliance about to be cemented, or that she had not learned the extent or stringency of its provisions. She seems to have started like one who has trodden upon a coiled serpent, as she put forth her first step toward Piedmont, and found these treaties in her path. She at once yielded to the ultimate proposal of England, and agreed to delay her declaration of war upon the condition suggested by Lord Malmesbury. But it was too late. The aggressive powers saw their advantage; and, whatever veil of deceit hesitation may be thrown over the proceeding, the powers who have been tempted to declare themselves will unquestionably persevere. Austria feels she must fight, and she has shown no slackness in accepting the necessity."

Le Nord of the 28th says that the Emperor Napoleon had notified the English Government that he had felt himself obliged to send a French army of occupation immediately into the Sardinian territory, for the purpose of being in time to protect his ally against the attack of Austria. The Cabinet of London replied that under the existing circumstances, England would offer no objection.

It is stated that the Cabinet of Vienna came in possession of the treaties between France and Russia, by purchase, and at the cheap price, considering the value of the information, of $100,000. On the other hand the Emperor Napoleon is said to have come, in the same way, in possession of the secrets of Austria, through the Bavarian Embassy at Paris. The vendor in the latter case is said to have been the Chevalier Wendland, who has been dismissed from the Embassy. The vendor of the Franco-Russian treaty is not named. It would appear, however, that he sold it twice over, once to the Austrian Cabinet and then to the London Times.

The London Times of the 29th April says: "The great fact which Europe has to consider, is, that France commenced a war with the avowed purpose of tearing up the treaties of 1815; and that a treaty, or convention, or understanding, is in existence between the Western and Eastern despotisms for the coercion, perhaps the spoliation, of Germany, and the resettlement of the Continent. Austria will have to bear the first shock of the conflict. France and Sardinia are in arms on the one side; on the other, Russia will at least take up an attitude of hostility such as Austria observed toward her in the Eastern war.

"Perhaps, indeed, Alexander may so far yield to the entreaties of his more vindictive counselors as to throw away his influence in Germany by an actual invasion of the Austrian States. To meet these dangers, Austria, for the first two months at least, must trust to herself alone. The ministers of Francis Joseph have, we should think, foreseen and calculated on this necessity. In fact, Count Buol has said as much in one of his notes, and the immense preparations, the high tone, and the rapid action of the Viennese cabinet indicate that, in the opinion of its ruler, Austria is able to carry a successful struggle with French and Piedmontese armies in Italy.

"A week will determine the nature of the campaign—whether Austria will maintain the offensive, or content herself with protecting her Italian possessions; whether Gens. Hess and Gyulai will march on Turin and besiege Alessandria; or fall back on the system of Lombard fortresses, which it has been the work of forty years to construct. The other plan is likely to find much more favor with a youthful Emperor and an army sore with provocation. It is, of course, to press on with every available battalion to Turin; to destroy, if possible, the Sardinian army before the French can come up; to crush the latter as they descend weary and disordered from the passes of the Alps; in fine, to carry out such a campaign as the Great Napoleon would have done if he had had 120,000 men in line, and his enemy's capital had been only 80 miles away.

"The Austrians have shown such contradictory qualities in their military history that we have no means of judging how they will act on the present occasion. They may exhibit the slowness and pedantry of 1796, or the energy of 1849. Another week may see them patrolling Turin, or giving orders for the abandonment of Milan. Frenchmen may not be superior to Germans, they are certainly not equal to Englishmen, in strength, endurance, and those qualities which—courage being supposed equal—are likely to decide the fate of battles. But in the great military quality of promptness they are without an equal.

"The manner in which the French troops have been dispatched to the Alps since Good Friday is a model for the study of our officers. The very act of entering a railway carriage and disposing of his knapsack and his musket has been taught the soldier as part of his drill. We may be assured that nothing that energy, science, and skill can accomplish for the speedy concentration of French armies at Turin and Genoa will be neglected. But the difficulties in the way of the Emperor Napoleon's troops are not few. The season is backward; Mont Cenis is covered with snow. The vast army of the French has been pushed forward without preparation, the commissariat is deficient, the country they enter is poor, there is very little of last year's corn to be had, and this year's will not be fit for the harvest for three months at the least.

"Then, there is the loss which invariably attends rapid marches in such inclement regions, and it may be predicted that the ambulances which follow in the rear of the army will have plenty of occupants before the plains of Piedmont are reached. But there is, on the other hand, a more favorable picture. The French have the command of the sea. It may be said, with confidence, that if France could only reach Italy across the Alps, the Austrians might seize the country and crush each division as it emerged from the passes. But the town and harbor of Genoa, almost impregnable, are in the hands of the Sardinians; we may say, indeed, in the hands of the French. French troops are arriving daily, and, in a few days these will constitute an army, which, in conjunction with the Sardinians at Alessandria, will be too formidable to be left in the rear of an invading force.

"If there be one thing which especially shows the military genius of the French, it is their transport of troops by sea. In the Russian war, while we had our Himmalayas and Jasons, they had only their own little trading vessels, most of them engaged in their channel "cabotage." Yet in every little brig, which probably had till within a few months before traded between St. Malo and Shorcham with eggs, the French managed to pack some 160 men, and send them 2,000 miles to Sebastopol.—Their present means of transport are immense, and the distance from Toulon to Genoa is hardly 300 miles. We cannot doubt that in a few days 50,000 French will have joined the Sardinians at Alessandria, and then it is hardly likely that the Austrian Commanders will risk a march on Turin."

MEMPHIS AND NEW ORLEANS.

We shall soon be in connection, by railroad, with Memphis, with Nashville, and the great North. A gentleman residing in Memphis, who has been on a visit to this city, writes a letter to the Memphis Bulletin, from which we make the following extracts:

Besides our noble line of packets, we see and hear many things that makes us proud of being Memphians; indeed at home we would never know the favor with which Memphis is viewed from abroad. Of the many conversations heard in regard to it, one, we think, will bear repeating. It was from an intelligent and extensively traveled son of the Old Dominion. After remarking in general terms, that Memphis had all the elements of future greatness, he particularized by saying she had the finest hotel, the finest jewelry store, finest drug store, and two of the finest hat stores in the South or West. But, said he, (and his manner indicated a regret that such a blight should exist,) "I learn that money is worth higher rates there than anywhere else, and yet the ladies seem generally to dress finer than in any city in the Union," and he seemed to wonder if any relationship existed between the two facts of the nature of cause and effect. I must admit that my Memphis pride was a little dampened—for I well know that there are more of the husbands and fathers of the costly attired ladies who display themselves on our streets, who pay, than who receive the legitimate Memphis rates of 2½ per cent. a month.

But to return to New Orleans, the past has been a week of anxiety and excitement in regard to the mighty waters that are now said to be higher here than ever known. We had two small crevasses in the upper part of the city, (both of which I saw,) but by the promptness and energy of the authorities, they were closed before any serious damage resulted. Notwithstanding the threatening of the waters, and rumors of war in Europe, this great heart, the center of our vast commercial system, continues to pulsate with all the regularity of vigorous health. Money is abundant in the banks and on the street, and our planting friends, who are now under water for the second season, can, on reliable securities, obtain an abundance for all legitimate uses at reasonable rates.

We are now (May day) enjoying most of the summer vegetables, even water-melons are making their appearance in the market. Tell your readers who wish to visit the Crescent City with their families, and who, like your correspondent, wish to find a quiet and domestic retreat combining all the luxuries without the annoyances of fashionable hotel life, to call at the Brooks House on Camp street, fronting Lafayette Square, where half the happy children in the city congregate in the afternoon to regain the wasted health of the day. It is neither a hotel nor boarding-house, but a home. The gentlemanly proprietor, Capt. Brooke, is a genuine Tennessean, formerly of Nashville. His estimable lady and interesting daughters all combine their efforts to make you feel as a member of the family; and our little preferences (that we all have) have only to be hinted at to be met in a manner that nearly makes you feel that you have bestowed rather than received a favor.

BISHOP SOULE is in improved health. Would that we could hear him preach—once—a pleasure we never enjoyed.

BISHOP EARLY was able to preach twice in one day at Memphis recently.

THE SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY.

The announcement of the time of opening, Faculty, course of study, prices, etc., of this institution, appeared in this paper last week. We were then too much crowded to insert even the fewest words of notice. Nor do we deem it even now necessary to say much. The policy—a just one—of the founders of the University has been do, without much talking. The newspapers, North and South, have not been called upon to puff it by the column; but we have good reason to believe that, as the means commensurate with the intention, it will take the lead of Southern institutions for the education of young men.

REV. DR. HOWELL triumphed over Graves at the recent Southern Baptist Convention, having been elected President by a large majority. He then, in a fine speech, resigned. His position before the Baptist Church is stronger than ever. Graves, having been excluded from the Church by the proper tribunal, is evidently cast out by the majority of the Convention. Well done old "Baptist principles." Our confrere of the Mississippi Baptist, who wavered in the time of trial, must find himself before we can give him "the right hand of fellowship." We must have an out-and-out "old line."

PROF. WILLIAM C. LARRABEE, well known in the West, a distinguished writer and preacher, is dead in the faith.

REV. WM. G. FOOTE, of the Texas Conference, Professor in Soule University, is dead.

THE OCEAN SPRINGS HOTEL we have already mentioned in these columns. On the third page, seventh column, will be found the advertisement. Instead of going North, go to Ocean Springs, for the Summer. A large, airy, finely furnished, and well-kept hotel is there for your comfort. You will probably leave there at the close of the season vigorous in body and cheerful in spirit. Keep a clear conscience, and Ocean Springs will renovate your body.

COLEMAN'S METALLIC FARM MILL, the advertisement of which will be found in the third page, seventh column, is said to be the most simple, durable, and efficient now in use—grinding corn in the ear, shelled corn, wheat, buckwheat, rye or oats—from five to fifteen bushels per hour, not only cutting, but crushing the grain. Can be used by steam, wind, water, or horse power.

THE GREAT AMERICAN BRICK MACHINE is worthy of a trial by all who wish to make instead of buy their brick. Although we are no judge of machinery, yet we know the inventor well, and know that he spent more than ten years of his life in perfecting it. Read what the advertisement promises. You will find it in the seventh column on the third page.

ALABAMA EPISCOPAL CONVENTION.

THE Episcopal Convention for the Diocese of Alabama met at Cahawba on the 5th instant, Right Rev. Bishop Cobbs Presiding, about twenty ministers being present—said to be about two-thirds of those in the State—and also many lay-delegates. Many more arrived afterwards. Thirteen out of thirty-eight parishes were represented. Four new parishes were admitted. We were somewhat agreeably surprised to see the names of our old acquaintances, Hons. E. C. Bullock, Jas. L. Pugh, and John Cochran, as delegates from Eufaula. Delegates were elected to the General Convention. A series of missionary resolutions were adopted, which declare that each Christian is a missionary in virtue of his baptism; that the Church in that Diocese is a missionary society in itself; that the Bishop is its organ of action, to select plans and men, and appropriate funds; that the clergy should preach at least one sermon annually on missions; that the Diocese should raise $5000 missionary money; that each parish should allow its rector to devote some time to adjacent mission fields, and afford facilities therefor—this last a very note-worthy thought. The next Convention is to be held in Selma. Twelve hundred dollars was subscribed to the fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of the deceased clergyman; including $500 from one gentleman alone. The Convention was a highly satisfactory and encouraging one. The illustrations of the word and speeches of the venerable Bishop are mentioned as eloquent, earnest, and impressive. We clip the above items from the Cahawba Gazette.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

MAY 25, 1859.

REV. DENNIS B. LEYNE.

Bro. GILLESPIE—Please publish the following offering of friendship to the memory of the Rev. D. B. LEYNE, who died recently on the Newy Yard Station, Alabama Conference.

I know not his early history, save that he was born in England, and raised in the Roman Catholic Church; in which he lived, as many do in that Church, with serious doubts of the truth of Christianity, until he was converted under the ministry of Dr. Boring, in Clarke county Alabama, some fifteen years ago.

In the next year, 1845, he joined the Alabama Conference, and was appointed to the Blountsville Circuit, as junior preacher. This work then included Walker county, and consequently was a good breaking-in Circuit, to try the nerve of the aspirant to literary honors. In 1846, I succeeded him on part of that work, and there heard the warmest praise of his deep piety and large ministerial promise everywhere, from the lips of the best and wisest in the Circuit, without the usual deductions in the shape of "ifs and buts." Brother Leyne had pictured himself in their hearts, not merely as a clever man and a good preacher, but as their very ideal of spiritual excellence and wisdom. Their description gave me a high conception of him as a man of God and a minister of Christ, which a subsequent personal acquaintance fully justified.

A close friendship was soon established between us, and a correspondence begun which continued up to his death. At the Montgomery Conference, in 1847, we were quartered with Bro. Richard Jones; and there communed freely and fully of plans for increased usefulness; and there, largely through his zeal, Clarke Conference prayer-meetings were started, with special reference to the seeking of a clean heart. These prayer-meetings were continued for several Conferences with much profit; and will, I trust, be again revived by the younger members of the Conference, whose time is not consumed with the press of Conference business. Here an incident occurred with regard to his appointment, which showed his determination to do any work assigned him, however disagreeable. "I have no care at all," said he, "about my appointment. The Bishop may send me where he pleases. I will go cheerfully to any work in the Conference, but —— Circuit," naming a certain mountain circuit. Why, Bro. Leyne, are you not willing to go there?" Because the preacher who was there last year found trouble."

The solemn hour for the rending of the appointments came. Bro. Leyne had not the least hint of the work of the cabinet, except that a presiding elder had asked him how he would like a certain pleasant work. In his simplicity, he thought the Bishop meant something, and it excited him, and sadly prepared him for the denouement. District after district was gone over, and the dreaded Circuit was called; when lo! to his blank amazement—the shock fell from a clear sky—Dennis B. Leyne, of all the Conference, was tacked on to the only work he planned in the whole field!

"Come for your plan," shouted one from the corner of the altar, as our brother stood stricken into stone with astonishment. The poor fellow fairly staggered, as he advanced with burning confusion to clutch the plan; but soon rallied, and recognized his defeat of his wishes as the fleger of providence. He had great success on that work; was fully paid, notwithstanding their poverty, and took up the largest Missionery collection ever made there.

In the sommer of thet year, he visited me in Tallatlega, to make the acquaintance of a pious young lady living South of us. She was absent, and did not see him. And though not unmindful to domestic joys, he thought his failure an indication of providence that his time was not yet. He never merried.

A desire to preech the gospel to the destitute burned in his heart, and impelled him to offer himself as a missionary, first for the Rio Grande Mission, but another was chosen; and two years afterward, at the Mobile Conference in 1851, where he was accepted for the California Mission. There he labored for two years; and, if reported correctly, organized some eight or ten charges, preseet Circuits. The management of the Mission, in sending him so frequently—once, I believe, in the dead of winter—did not comport with his views; he therefore determined to return to Alabema.

I have no doubt his labors in thet lefant Conference during his stay there, were as great a blessing to the work as the ministry of any other in the same time. Possibly the reason, in part, for those changes was that he never excelled in the administration of discipline.

Whatever was lovely had his whole heart; and all appearance of moral obliquity his utter abhorrence. Hence his whole nature rose in arms against evil; and impetuously, and with an outspoken frankness, amounting to a seeming impatience, he denounced the wrong. His piety would not do injustice to any men, and his nature could not do what he thought right in a half-hearted manner—very naturally, therefore, the lukewarm, the negligent, and the men of slack principles among us, were frequently his enemies. And even the wise and the pure, who keow that moral ceres are not perfected in an instant, and who patiently hope all things, could not always approve of the haste of his administration. On the other hand, this impetuous recoil from evil was the occasion of spreading more widely the usefulness of his preaching.

At the Tuscaloosa Conference in 1853, he re-appeared among us, and was appointed to the Apalachicola Station, where a revival began with his first sermon, and ripened into a blessed work. Imagining the climate of Florida suited his health, he transferred to 1854 to the Florida Conference and was stationed at Jacksonville. There also a revival began with his introductory labors and went on until more then two hundred were converted. It was one of the greatest effusions of the Spirit ever known in thet Conference. Next year he was appointed to Albany Ga., thee in rather a cold state; again his faith triumphed in a blessing on his ministry, but to a more limited extect. Aed the year thereafter he rejoiced in a good work among the soldiers and civilians at Tampa Bay. In 1858 he was sect to Brunswick Ga., just then building a new church for the aid of which he traveled extensively in Florida, Georgia and Alabama, and everywhere his preaching was greatly blessed to the profit of the hearers.

At the last session of the Alahama Conference he was transferred back to us, and appointed to the Navy-yard Station. Once more, and early in the presect year, God blessed his ministry, and his charge was revived. At first, he found some difficulty in getting a soitable home, but told Bro. Miller, the Presiding Elder, he "would rather spend five hundred dollars than leave the place assigned him by the Conference." A few days after his meeting closed he was taken sick, and felt from the first his attack was mortal. He was ready—was found watching, with lamp trimmed and burning. He desired to depart, and be with Christ. When asked of his prospects he calmly, he said—"All is right in thet direction." And again, "I am all right." "O, this is not hard; the hard part was fifteen years ago"—meaning his conversion. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace." It was his end.

For long yeare he had preached the perfection spoken of by the Psalmist; and his own faith, as he often testified, had triumphed in thet "perfect love which casteth out all fear." Indeed, it was his delight to urge the children of God on to entire sanctification; hence, he knew no fear as he descended into the valley of the shadow of death, and passed away from sight into the rest of God's people. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

Bro. Leyne was an Israelite in whom there was no guile. In the social circle, he had a kindly word for everybody—was fond of children, attentive to servants—was full of quaint remark, which made him a universal favorite. His cheerful flow of spirits, his benevolence, and habit of looking on the pleasant side of things, diffused a vein of gladness wherever he went. He had not a particle of "sour godliness." As a preacher, his sermons were rich, unique, and deeply spiritual, and never failed to command attention. The novelty of his thoughts, manner and accent, would often provoke a smile; but always to the profit and not detriment of the hearer—unless indeed he was of that class who imagine all excellence" cribbed, confined and confined to a cold, dead pulpit mannerism; and whose vanity would have improved the injunction to the prophet, to "smite with the hands and stamp with the feet;" by ordering him to become a petrified mass of divinity, giving forth sepulchral utterances with stately dignity. To the lovers of such pulpit-icicles as these the tears, if there are any, upon the very cheeks of the hearers, his preaching was not in good taste. Nevertheless, in disregard of small criticisms, Bro. Leyne went on his way still pouring out "thoughts that breathe and words that burn"—a demonstration of the Spirit and of power.

Brother Leyne possessed a clear intellect, a fruitful imagination, and great fluency of speech; but was greater still in his emotional nature. The heart of the wise addeth learning to his lips; hence his sanctified heart, filled as it was, with those emotions which are the root and soul of all spiritual principles—such as reverence, faith, love, purity, meekness, patience, the spirit of prayer, and charity, instructed him profoundly unto the deep things of God; and made him great in those spiritual intuitions which can neither be learned nor taught by mere logical formula or skilful word-building. On the other hand, the depth, intensity, and grandeur of his emotional being re-acted upon and lifted up, and gave breadth, richness and power to his intellect also—and fitted him to be an eminently successful teacher of the head, living, spiritual verities of our holy religion. All men felt that he spoke from the heart; and but few left the hearing of the word from his lips, without feeling that he spoke to the heart. I knew no parallel to his early, and oft repeated, successes in his work. His master did not allow him to stay here long enough to have his worth fully accredited. God stamped greatness upon him and took him to himself. "Know ye not that a great man is fallen in Israel?"

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

South Cane Brake Colored Mission.—Rev. J. C. HUCKABEE writes: "I send my raport for thie Missioe, for the first and second quarters of this year. This is an entirely new work, made up maioly since our last Conference. It has twelve preaching places, four of them Churches, at which the colored people from different plantations attend. Four white congregations are regularly served by the Missionery. The best place for preaching to the colored population, is to assemble them at Churches, and the reach as large a number as practicable at the same hour. The children learn the catechism rapidly; and, under the divine blessing, there is hope of accomplishing much good among both old and young. The patrons of this Mission have not yet learned that it is improper to treat a Missionary with the same courtesy they show to other ministers of the gospel."

Black's Bend Circuit.—Rev. Anson West writes thet at the second quarterly meeting, first Sunday in May, there were reported, for the past quarter—received on probatioe, six whites, nine colored; into full connection, forty-four whites, eighty-seven colored; by letter, three whites. The people seem to have a fountain of kindness opened in their hearts since they have built a persenege. A good Presbyterian lady has helped to furnish it. Let all the circuits build parsonages. Austrian Manœuvres in Italy—French Troops at Rome—Anticipated Revolt in Turkey—Austrian Priests Exciting the War-spirit.

Liverpool, May 7.—The letest advices received at Loedoe, respecting the movements of the Austrian army, are of the 4th instant, since which date nothing is known of the movements of Gen. Gyulai's troops.

At last accounts; they appeared to be retreating or making some strategical movement in a new direction.

Later accounts from Rome represent that the excitement attendant upon the announcement of hostilities in Sardinia had subsided, and comparativn quiet prevailed.

The French troops stationed at Rome were not to be withdrawn for the present.

The Archbishop of Vienna had issued and oireniated a pastoral letter throughout Austria, designed to arouse thn war-spirit of the Catholic population against Piedmont and Francn.

The Archbishop attacks with extreme severity the conduct of Piedmont, and professes to enumerate the crimes of which she has been guilty.

He attacks with equal severity the ambitious designs which he attributes to the Emperor Napoleon, and which have, as he represents, induced Napoleon to aid Piedmont in the unholy war which has now broken out.

DOMESTIC.

Steam-Fire Engines—after much opposition, especially from firemen—are likely to supercede the hand-engines. Three new ones, making four, are to be purchased. A moral, as well as a physical good is to be accomplished by this change. A steam-fire engine is a sort of city missionary. It is a peace establishment. It disbands a standing army, and dispels its evil influences. That excellent paper, the Delta, is doing a good work in advocacy of this change.

The Mate of the steamer Ocean Spray was recently convicted by a jury, at St. Louis, upon the charge of manslaughter. The boat was destroyed by fire, and some ten or fifteen live, were lost. The Mate, Mr. Davis, in order to keep ahead of another boat, with which the Ocean Spray was racing, had a barrel of spirits of turpentine opened near the fire-doors, for the purpose of dipping the wood and coal in the turpentine, in order to keep up a full head of steam. By some carelessness, the terpentine was ignited, and flames spread over the boat, destroying her in a few minutes. This is the first conviction which has taken place under the law passed by Congress in 1852, for the better protection and safety of passengers.

Another Fire in Memphis, on the night of the 10th, has destroyed $150,000 worth of property. A tornado on the same night, did much damage.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evining, May 23, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, neding on the 21st inst.:

The past week has been a period of hnt little activity in our leading commodities, Cotton having been unfavorably affected by the European advices, while buyers of Tobacco have come forward hut for limited parcels. Sugar and Molasses also move slowly, hut Breadstuffs and Provisions, in view of a foreign demand, have been objects of speculation, with advanced prices in the early part of the week, though drooping at thn close.

The river has fallen six or seven inches during the week. The weather has been warm, rather summerish.

Cotton.—Factors still continue to withhold their stocks from market, not being satisfied with the occasional offers made, and so onsettled and irregular were prices that we were unable during the first three days of the week to resume quotations—the sales during which time were 3200 bales, 1700 were sold on Saturday and 1500 on Tuesday, thara being no business does on Monday, the day on which advices were before the public, announcieg the commencement of actual hostilities between Sardinia and Austria. On Wednesday there was rather more inquiry, and offers were accepted to the extent of about 3000 bales, at irregular prices, the prevailing rate being f1c. for Middling. On Thursday the market opened with a tolerably fair inquiry, and several parcels had been disposed of when operations were checked by receipt of the Canada's advices, reporting the decline at Liverpool within the week to have been ¼ to ⅛d. per pound. The sales, therefore, were confined to some 1500 bales, in several limited lots, and at irregular prices, though the prevailing rate for Middling was still f1c. On Friday the inquiry was renewed on the part of several buyers, who transacted business to the extent of about 3500 bales; making a total for the past three dnys of 8000 bales; and for the week of 11,200 bales. Total receipts of the week 6004, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobila, Florida and Texas) 1,036,970 bales, against 1,500,006 bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 21,960 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 20th inst. 150,048 bales. With respect to prices, we have to remark that so much irregularity prevails it is impossible to give general quotations with any approach to accuracy. The sales of yesterday, however, indicated a still further advantage on tha side of purchasers, and the only qeotations we can veeture to give, are f0¾ to 10½c. for Low Middling and f0¾ to f1c. for Middling. Wu hear of occasional sales below these rates, while at the same time they are refused by many factors, who still withhold their stocks from market.

Oats sell at 68 to 73 cents per hushel, for ordinary to prime St. Louis, and 75c. for choice St. Louis and Canada. Bran is still quoted for limited transactions at $1 60 to $1 70 per 100 lbs. "METHODIST PULPIT SOUTH"

Washington, D. C. May 20th, 1859.

Since sending ont the second edition of the "Methodist Pulpit South," I have discovered a number of typographical errors in several of the sermons, and have to request that they may not be read critically until those errors are corrected, which shall be done in a very short time. Particularly do I make this request, respecting the sermons of Bros: McTyeire and Thweatt. In brother Thweatt's sermon several quotation marks are omitted by the printer.

It may not be amiss to state in this connection that the work is in great demand, and thus far I have not been able to fill all ordera promptly; hnt that I am fast maturing plans which, when consummated, will enable me to turn nit the work sufficiently fast to meet any demand. Send on your orders brethren, and let us secure a speedy sale of one hundred thousand copies, ere the close of the present year. Do so, and we shall be able to build a fine Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in Washington city at once. I am already making Arrangements to commence the work, and I want the Southern Methodist people—all of them, identified with it. Wm. T. Smithson.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

HOPE FOR THE SUFFERER!

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE,

FOR

THE CURE OF GOUT AND RHUMATISM.

When we think of the Panacea so highly recommended against these two dreadful maladies, we cannot help being struck with skepticism at the appearance of every new preparation purporting to affect a cure.

If, however, one will for a moment reflect on the rapid onward course of improvement in all branches of science, which every second brings forth in this wonderful age of progress, he will concede that a new discovery may legitimately be expected to come and perfect the knowledge already somewhat imparted by former ones.

We do not here pretend to have in our power the never-failing remedy which is bound to affect a total, a permanent cure. Such a pretension would prove no less than a denial of the difference of constitutions and of habits, principal causes of frequent relapses. It would be to ignore the nature of the disease itself. But, fully confident of the effects of the ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE, we can, with all due assurance, promise a cure to those whose disease is not of long standing, and a relief always to those who may have been for years laboring under attacks violent enough to confine them prostrate on their sick bed for days and weeks at a time.

We have been imparted this valuable receipt, together with the authorization to compound the remedy, by one of our friends, Dr. Froment, of Paris. For many years that eminent physician has employed it in his private practice, with the utmost success, and the sufferers have since entirely laid aside Reynold's Specific, Boube's Syrup, Lartigue's Pills, and even the Wine of Andaran, (the nearest to the one we now offer, from the similarity of the doses.)

The ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE contains seven different medicines, having for their agent of immission White Wine of the purest quality. Each one of these ingredients is separately infused in Wine, in order with more certainty to extract from it its active principle. Fourteen days are needed to perfect the operation. The result of that remarkable combination is, that each therapeutic agent has its direct action upon a distinct part of the system. So the urinary secretions, as well as the stools, and Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

A LITTLE BOY writes to inquire how it is the Editor finds out all about the ways of little boys. He thinks his pa must have told. He says the editor talks to him just like his pa does. Well, we do not like to tell all about it. But we do know. Be good boys, and we shall know that too.

THE FOLLOWING was sent us from a school girl in [illegible]. We commend it to our young readers, and hope to hear from the young lady again.

"Thou [illegible] forever."

How [illegible] solemn import is contained in these simple words. O man, how fearful and wonderful is thy creation! Frail, and mortal—thou art swayed by the slightest breath of Divine Omnipotence. Cut off in an hour from life and health, and all the beautiful things of earth, to sink and resolve back again into thy native dust from which thou first was formed.

Thou art frail as the flowers of the field; yet, thou art immortal—"thou livest forever!" Through all the boundless ages of eternity, thou shalt live. Ages on ages shall roll round—nations and empires, kingdoms and principalities, shall rise and flourish and pass away; revolutions come—wars, in all their horror, ravage the earth—worlds pass away—and even this beautiful earth on which we live be destroyed and burned up, yet the soul of man will continue to live forever. O, solemn thought! and one which should occupy the minds of poor sinful human beings.

Mysterious are the ways of Deity, and far too great to be grasped by the minds of ignorant mortals as we are. Yet we know that we shall pass from earth to another state of existence—which is immortal, undying and unchanging. That if we are good and virtuous in this present life, we shall exchange it for a world of beauty and glory. That we shall dwell forever in a city, whose streets are paved with gold—whose walls are set with all manner of precious stones—whose inhabitants are pure, holy and supremely happy—singing endless praises to the King who is the King of kings and the Lord of lords, even God, the Supreme Ruler of heaven and earth.

There, in that glorious city, we shall dwell forever, with our God and with Christ, His Son—who also is our Redeemer. He it was who left a glorious heaven, and came to dwell in this sinful world to redeem us from sin, and purchase heaven and immortal life—that we might live for ever with Him, and have the angels and all pure spirits for our companions.

"Thou [illegible] forever!" O man, think not your life will end with time. Then, 't is only but begun. Time [illegible] given us to prepare for eternity, and we should [illegible] that when we are [illegible] rejoicing [illegible] spirits will [illegible] by of life.

[illegible] her [illegible] solemn words—"Thou livest forever."

BLANCHE BERNARD.

[illegible] of Childhood.

[illegible] little children, what a blessing it would be to you, if you could understand the joys of your childhood! Childhood is a spring-season that never will return. Enjoy it then in the fear of God, and it will make you happy to remember it when you grow old. The Trinity Journal says: We heard a child trying to sing in sleep. The storm's artillery was thundering against the gable-end of the house, and the timbers shook in distress, but the innocent sleeper, away out in the pathless flower-grounds of a child's dreams, broke forth in half-defined song—

"O, Lily, sweet Lily,
West Lily Davis, ain't you?"

"Lord God," was the prayer of our heart, "that I could go out, too, to the Elysian fields where the Shepherd of souls leads the little ones of his flock by the perennial rivers of peace and joy!" But we could not go. Age had built a defensive wall of the huge blocks of years; a grey hair was laid across the stile and we could not ascend; a golden ladder leaned against the wall, but Time, with his destroying scythe, stood on the thirty-third round, and we could not pass. Yet we heard the voices of children, singing in the Paradise of youth.

Home.

How touchingly beautiful are the relations of home! There each is bound by an electric chain that seems to pass to all hearts in the family group; so that one cannot enjoy pleasures unless all partake in it. If one heart is oppressed, all sympathize; if one is exalted all must share the happiness. It is in the home where the aching heart is soothed, where the oppressed are relieved, the outcast reclaimed, the sick healed, or, failing, the tear of pure love drops from the mourner's eyes, when the dear ones are gathered to their long home.

Be Sure Your sin Will Find You Out.

"Momma, mother," said Mary Jay, running into her mother's room, "I believe I've found out what makes Clinton sick every day. I saw him just now, out in the garden, behind the lilac bushes, with big Fred Saunders, and Fred was smoking a cigar."

"Did Clinton have a cigar?" asked her mother.

"No, I didn't see any; I just saw them a minute. I guess they didn't see me."

"I will go and see myself."

Saying this, Clinton's mother put on her bonnet, and walked out into the garden. There the children stood, in a shady corner, each with a cigar in his mouth, and Clinton with a bundle of matches in his hand.

The two boys who were with him ran when they saw her; but his mother called Clinton in a loud voice to stop, so he stood still. He knew he had been doing wrong, and his first impulse was to get rid of the cigar.

What do you suppose he did with it?

It is very strange, but it is true, that people who are caught doing wrong, never act as they thought they would, if found out. It is as true of grown-up people as of children. It is very easy for persons to make up their minds what they will do if caught in a crime, but, strange to say, they seldom do the thing they planned, and most often do the very thing that proves them guilty.

Clinton might have thrown away his cigar, I suppose, before his mother reached him; but instead of that, he thrust it under his apron, and pushed it under his belt. He did not do this because he thought this the best plan, or because he thought, at all, it was what is called an impolite.

"Clinton," said his mother, "have you a cigar?"

"No," said the little boy. One sin always leads to another.

"Clinton," said his mother solemnly, "is this the truth?"

"No, ma'am, I haven't got any," persisted he: "Fred and Benny had though."

Just at that moment a little blue smoke came curling from under Clinton's apron, just above his belt. He turned pale as he saw a hole burning in his apron, and there was the burnt end of a cigar under it!

Ah, Clinton, your sin found you out!

I will not tell you how Clinton was punished, only you may know he did not smoke any more cigars.

"I [illegible] was a silly fellow to put a lighted cigar [illegible]" some child says. "I would have hid it [illegible] that?"

[illegible] wouldn't. You do not know what you would [illegible] done. Unless you have been a great while learning [illegible] double, and grown cunning, you would not have [illegible] any wiser. [illegible] a child or man, who is generally honest, commits some sin and wishes to hide it, the very thing he does to hide it quite often becomes the means of his being discovered. It is quite remarkable how often this is the case. It is one of God's ways of detecting crime. He has made the mind so, that when the conscience is guilty it cannot act as when it is clear. It is never safe to say, "I shan't be found out." Yes, you will; and most likely you will tell of yourself, as Clinton did.

"When you want to sin in safety go where God is not." But since God is in every place, you may be sure your sin will find you out!

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

SIN AND FOLLY OF SCOLDING.

"Fret not thyself to do evil."—Psalm xxxvii, 8.

1. IT IS A SIN AGAINST GOD.—It is evil and only evil, and that continually. David understood both human nature and the law of God. He says, "Fret not thyself in any wise to do evil." That is, never fret or scold, for it is always a sin. If you cannot speak without fretting or scolding, keep silence.

2. IT DESTROYS AFFECTION.—No one ever did, ever can or ever will love a habitual fretter, fault-finder, or scolder. Husbands, children, wives, relatives, or domestics, have no affection for peevish, fretful fault-finders. Few tears are shed over the graves of such. Persons of high moral principle may tolerate them—may bear with them. But they cannot love them more than the sting of nettles, or the noise of mosquitoes. Many a man has been driven to the tavern and to dissipation, by a peevish, fretful wife. Many a wife has been made miserable by a peevish, fretful husband.

3. IT IS THE BANE OF DOMESTIC HAPPINESS.—A fretful, peevish, complaining fault-finder in a family, is like the continual chafing of an inflamed sore. No to the man, woman or child, who is exposed to the influence of such a temper in another. Nine-tenths of all domestic trials and unhappiness spring from this source. Mrs. A. is of this temperament. She wonders her husband is not more fond of her company. That her children give her so much trouble. That domestics do not like to work for her. That she cannot secure the good-will of young people. The truth is, she is peevish and fretful. Children fear her and do not love her. She never gained the affections of a young person, nor never will, till she leaves off fretting.

4. IT DEFEATS THE END OF FAMILY GOVERNMENT.—Good family government is the blending authority with affection, so as to secure respect and love. Indeed, it is the great secret of managing young people. Now, your fretters may inspire fear, but they always make two faults where they correct one. Scolding at a child, fretting at a child, sneering at a child, taunting a child, treating a child as though it had no feelings, inspires dread and dislike, and fosters those very dispositions from which many of the faults of childhood proceed. Mr. G. and Mrs. F. are of this class. Their children are made to mind; but how? Mrs. F. frets and scolds her children. She is severe enough upon their faults. She seems to watch them in order to find fault. She sneers at them. Treats them as though they had no feelings. She seldom gives them a command without a threat, and a long-running, fault-finding commentary. When she chides, it is not done in a dignified manner. She raises her voice, puts on a cross look, threatens, strikes them, pinches their ears, slaps their heads, etc. The children cry out, pout, sulk; and poor Mrs. F. has to do her work over pretty often. Then she will find fault with her husband, because he does not fall in with her ways, or chime with her as chorus.

5. FRETTING AND SCOLDING MAKE HYPOCRITES.—As a fretter never receives confidence and affection, so no one likes to tell them anything disagreeable, and thus procure for themselves a fretting. Now, children conceal as much as they can from such persons. They cannot make up their minds to be frank and open-hearted. So husbands conceal from their wives, wives from their husbands. For a man may brave a lion, but he likes not to come in contact with nettles and mosquitoes.

6. IT DESTROYS ONE'S PEACE OF MIND.—The more one frets, the more he may. A fretter will always have enough to fret at, especially if he or she has the bump of order and neatness largely developed. Something will always be out of place. There will always be some dirt somewhere. Others will not eat right, look right, talk right. And fretters are generally so selfish as to have no regard for any one's comfort but their own.

7. IT IS A MARK OF VULGAR DISPOSITION.—Some persons have so much gall in their dispositions, are so selfish, that they have no regard to the feelings of others. All things must be done to please them. They make their husbands, wives, children, domestics, the conductors by which their spleen and ill-nature are discharged. Woe to the children who are exposed to their influences. It makes them callous and unfeeling; and when they grow up, they pursue the same course with their own children, or those intrusted to their management; and thus the race of fretters is perpetuated. Any person who is in the habit of fretting or sneering or taunting husbands, wives, children, or domestics, shows either a bad disposition or else ill-breeding. For it is generally your ignorant, low-bred people that are guilty of such things.

THE WAY TO SPOIL GIRLS.

IF ANY parent wishes a recipe how to spoil daughters, it can be easily and readily given, and can be proved by the experience of hundreds to be certain and efficacious.

1. Be always telling her, from earliest childhood, what a beautiful creature she is. It is a capital way of inflating the vanity of a little girl, to be constantly exclaiming, "How pretty!" Children understand such flattery, even when in the nurse's arms, and the evil is done the character in its earliest formation.

2. Begin, as soon as she can toddle around, to rig her up in fashionable clothes and rich dresses. Put a hoop upon her at once, with all the artificial adornments of flounces, and feathers, and flowers, and curls. Fondness for dress will thus become a prominent characteristic and will usurp the whole attention of the young immortal, and be a long step toward spoiling her.

3. Let her visit so much that she finds no happiness at home, and therefore will not be apt to stay there and learn home duties. It is a capital thing for a spoiled daughter to seek all her happiness in visiting and change of place and associates. She will thus grow as useless as modern fashionable parents delight that their daughters should be.

4. Let her reading consist of novels of the nauseatingly sentimental kind. She will be spoiled sooner than if she perused history or science. Her heart will be occupied by fictitious scenes and feelings; her mind filled with unrealities, and her alms placed on fashion and dress and romantic attachments.

5. Be careful that her education gives her a smattering of all the accomplishments, without the slightest knowledge of the things really useful in life. Your daughter won't be spoiled so long as she has a real desire to be useful in the world, and alms at its accomplishment. If her mind and time are occupied in modern accomplishments, there will be no thought of the necessity and virtue of being of some real use to somebody pervading her heart, and she will be soon ready as a spoiled daughter.

6. As a consequence, keep her in profound ignorance of all the useful arts of housekeeping, impressing upon her mind that it is vulgar to do anything for yourself, or to learn how anything is done in the house. A spoiled daughter should never be taught the mysteries of the kitchen—such things a lady always leaves to the servants. It would be "vulgar" for her to know how to dress trout or shad, to bake, to wash, to iron, to sweep, to wring the neck of a live chicken, pluck it and prepare it for breakfast, or to do anything that servants are hired to do. As a mistress of a house, it is her duty to sit on a velvet sofa all day, in the midst of a pyramid of silks and flounces, reading the last flash novel, while her domestics are performing the labors of the house.

To complete the happiness of your spoiled daughter, marry her to a bearded youth with soft hands, who knows as little how to earn money as she does to save it. Her happiness will be finished, for her lifetime.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. ELIZABETH ANN JENNINGS, consort of Dr. W. M. Jennings, died at the residence of Dr. S. G. Cloud, in Franklin parish, La., the 5th May, 1859. She was born in Lawrence county, Kentucky, in December, 1813. Her father removed to Jefferson county, where she married Dr. Jennings, February 9, 1840. She embraced religion in early life and joined the Baptist Church, in which she lived a constant member till her death. Though she was a member of the "Baptist Church" and her husband a member of the Methodist Church, yet no two ever passed through this life more smoothly than they did in their religion. She was like the apostle, who believed that "the kingdom of God consisted not in meat and drink, but in righteousness, peace and joy, in the Holy Ghost." Nature had given her an amiable disposition, which was "sanctified by the spirit of truth." Moral gloom appeared to be a stranger to her. As a wife she was lovely, and truly a "help-meet;" as friend and neighbor, kind and estimable. She leaves a husband behind who could appreciate her worth. Sister J. had been the child of affliction for many years, but she was never heard to repine. T. H. MCCLENDON.

REV. RALPH G. SKINNER died at his home in Bossier parish, February 10th, 1859, aged about 07 years; was born in North Carolina; resided two years in Mississippi; moved to Louisiana in 1850; a professor of religion thirty-six, and a local preacher about thirty years. Brother S. was a plain man—impulsive—of strong natural mind. Was afflicted most of his life with rheumatism—a great sufferer at times; believed that his afflictions were sanctified for his good. Death was hurried on at last by an attack of pneumonia. His end was peace. An aged widow is left to mourn her loss. P. M. G.

ALEXANDER Z. ELLIOT departed this life April, 4th 1859, at the residence of his father, Rev. Alexander Elliot, of Carrol County, Mississippi. Born in Yazoo County, August the 30th, 1830; he embraced religion in August 1858, and has I think lived in its enjoyment until death. His disease was Consumption. He was expecting death. Although his sufferings were great, he could say to his relatives, "meet me in heaven." He was heard to say, frequently, "Glory to God! I have a home in Heaven." The large procession that attended his burial, told that he left many dear relatives and friends to mourn.

MR. WILLIAM T. GODBOLD was born in Wilcox County, Ala., January 29th, 1842; and died of typhoid-fever at his mother's residence in Ala., March 29th, 1859. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in July, 1858; and made a profession of religion. He was taken away in youth, but he was ready. While disease was killing his body his soul was alive to God. He rejoiced while dying; and, in an ecstasy of joy, he fell asleep in Jesus. The Church has lost a pious young member. Mother weep not for your son. A. W.

SARAH E., daughter of John and Mary Clower, died in Holmes county, Mississippi, May 5th 1859, aged ten years, six months, and twenty days; snatched in the morning of life, from a kind father and doting mother. She possessed those traits of mind and character which endeared her to all. "Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me." This is our consolation and this our hope!

"Dearest daughter, thou hast left us;
Here thy loss we deeply feel;
But tis' God that hath bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal.

Yet again we hope to meet thee,
When the day of life is fled,
Then in heaven with joy to greet thee;
Where no farewell tear is shed." H.

TENNESSEE MCKEE, daughter of Alexander and Hester McKee, of Madison Parish, Louisiana, was born November 1st, 1854; and died, March 30th, 1859, aged, four years, four months and 29 days. Little Tennessee was the darling of her parents; but God in his providence saw fit to remove her from this world of trouble, and transplant her to the Paradise above.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of South Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, and that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, to the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated.

ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses or a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and are running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment, I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON CITY.

Washington, May 20.

Mr. Editor:—Monday, May 16, was a gala day in this city. It had been selected for the annual celebration of the Sabbath School cause. The weather was in the highest degree propitious, clear, calm, and just cool enough for an out-door parade. At an early hour groups of children in their best attire, and with the merriest faces, were hurrying along the streets. Soon you would hear the stirring notes of music and see the marching of separate companies with their banners in various directions. The Smithsonian grounds were the common rendezvous. There they all fell into line, and in double file stepped to music, the procession extending through a mile and a half, and numbering about four thousand children.

It was a grand sight, as the Sabbath-School army, with flags and banners, and flowers and wreaths, in several sections each headed by a brass band and well officered, marched from the avenue to the Capitol, and were seated beneath the thick-leaved trees to hear speeches from two ministers of Christ, and to send up their thanksgiving in melodies which reached the ear of the King upon his throne. They fitly represented the unity in variety of the christian church. Each company flung forth to the breeze their own banner with the distinctive names in which they rejoiced; and yet one spirit animated all, one cause rallied them, one sentiment expressed by their various mottoes. My thoughts went across the sea to Sardinia. I saw glittering arms, the picturesque colors, the many regiments of Austrians, French and Sardinians. I listened to martial music which fired the heart, and then to the rattle of musketry, the bursting of bombs, and all the confusion of war. Then in the hush and calm of the day after battle, I watched over the gory field of carnage, gazed upon the dead, the dying, the maimed, heard their groans of pain at hand, and the cries of the families here and from the distance. I thanked God that our land beheld no such scene; that this army on which I looked consisted of the soldiers of the cross, the soldiers of peace and good will, whose weapons are truth and love, whose only enemies are sin and woe. One of the speakers, Dr. Sunderland, asked the vast crowd of children, "Do you think that this is a happier and more glorious spectacle than ever was seen under the walls of the old Capitol of Rome?" And the multitude of voices shouted like the noise of many waters, Yes! yes! yes!

And now shall I launch off from this description to a few practical remarks about Sabbath-Schools in general? I do hope that a new era has been inaugurated among us by the appointment of a special director of this cause, in connection with our extensive plans for the publication of books. In the Infant Department a common feature in your section? I am sorry to confess that we are very slow in adopting it in the Virginia Conference. It used to be a troublesome question—What shall we do with this host of little ones who are sent to us by their parents and who are so fond of coming to school? We cannot dismiss them, for Jesus tells us not to forbid them to come, and everybody says that with the earliest dawn of thought, religious principles must be instilled, and then we may expect them to grow with their growth, and strengthen with their strength, until they reach at the same time maturity in natural and spiritual wisdom, in stature and grace, and are qualified to fill stations of usefulness in the church as well as to enter upon the ordinary occupations of life. But teachers find it a dull business to say, A, B, C, a–b ab, b–a ba, over and over to a child. Only one could be taught at a time, and the rest of the class were either tired with doing nothing or busy at mischief; the lessons were not properly religious; and more advanced classes were annoyed by the loud voices of the prattlers. An easy remedy is now provided. Sixty infants may be seated in a separate room; may have their own library—milk for babes; may listen to one teacher; may repeat answers from the catechism, or texts from the Bible, or verses from the hymn book; may sing the sweetest songs. They can be interested in hearing instruction, when they would fret at confinement to a book; and while they can not read well enough to be amused or profited, they can understand the simple lessons spoken by a lady whom they love and who loves them.

Another trouble in my boyhood was the lack of suitable seats for the classes. The school was generally taught in the basement or body of the church and the pews could not be moved at all or not easily. Perhaps there was not room enough on a single bench for a class, and if there was, the teacher could not face them. By having benches with movable backs like those in railroad cars, this difficulty is obviated. The scholars are shut in to themselves, and, seated in two rows facing one another, can learn and recite without inconvenience.

To keep interest always alive in teachers and scholars, is one chief task of the superintendent. Talent, taste, tact, are very important for the accomplishment of this object. It will not do to go every Sabbath through one old routine. Variety must be thrown into the exercises—such variety as will not interfere with the singleness of purpose that is the most essential feature. Excellence in every respect must be aimed at, and the whole school must be spurred on by a wholesome emulation and ambition. They must resolve to have the largest number of pupils, to say the best lesson, to preserve the best order, to raise the most money, to have the amplest library, to sing in the best style, to get up the finest exhibitions, to be the model school. By short and spirited speeches, by anecdotes, both facetious and pathetic, provided they are in harmony with the sacredness of the subject and occasion, in illustration of the truth—by the judicious intermingling of pious songs among the other exercises, a superintendent may do much to throw life and interest into the school.

Above all, let all the officers be filled with love for the souls committed to their care, with a sense of the preciousness of religion, with desire that they may be early brought to the experience of saving grace, and with faith in the divine blessing on their faithful labors. Thus will much be accomplished towards the hastening of the millennial glory. J. O. G.

"ALESSANDRIA."

This place, the rendezvous of the Sardinian army, whither the King has gone to take command, is probably destined to play an important part in the coming war.

It is a fortified city, near the Eastern frontier of Piedmont, whose guns bristle towards the Austrian territory. It stands in the midst of a sterile plain. It is the great stronghold of Piedmont, and is to the Sardinians what Gibraltar is to the English, or Sebastopol was to the Russians. During the reign of the French in Italy, its formidable fortifications made it, one of the strongest places in Europe, but these were subsequently demolished, leaving only the citadel. Within the past few years workmen have been busy in reconstructing them in anticipation of the events now at hand. In the surrounding plain, two miles distant, is Napoleon's celebrated battle-field of Marengo. Alessandria is garrisoned with several thousand troops, and being connected with Turin and Genoa by railway, any number can be readily concentrated there. To capture it would be a crowning glory to the Austrian Generals, and to lose it, a deep humiliation to Sardinia.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

I HAVE EXAMINED IT.

Did Jesus Christ utter the words—"the foxes have holes" etc—when, on his journey from Galilee to Jerusalem he had been refused a night's lodging by the Samaritan villagers? This is the question. The affirmative view of it was presented by the writer in an article sometime since. The correctness of this view your correspondent "Jefferson" calls in question in the Advocate of 11th inst.

Let it be understood in the first place, that the three first Evangelists relate many acts and sayings of Christ in common; sometimes connecting his words and acts, and sometimes giving one without mentioning the other, when, then one Evangelist tells us that Christ said certain things under certain circumstances, and another relates the words merely, without any reference to circumstances, I think we are bound to take it for granted that the former is correct, and that the latter does not contradict him. For an example, Matthew says Christ "went up into a mountain ..... and opened his mouth and taught them saying." He then gives the sermon; Luke gives a part of the same sermon, but says nothing about when or where he spoke it. Here we must take the history of the delivery of this sermon, as given by Matthew, as the true one. Apply this rule to the case in question. In Matthew's account of this conversation there is no allusion to any attendant circumstance, save the approaching of the scribe to Christ. In Luke it is expressly said, "And it came to pass that as they went in the way, a certain man said unto him, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." According to Luke, he was in the act of travelling—("as he went") when the conversation took place. In Matthew we find nothing to contradict this. It is true, he relates various parts both before and after he relates the conversation. It is true, he represents Christ in the preceding verse as being upon the sea-shore, ready to embark. But he does not say the conversation took place while he was there. And I am glad he does not; for Luke expressly says, the conversation took place as they went in the way.

Again, the circumstances described in the preceding verses are strongly suggestive of such a conversation. He needed a place of rest and had it not. Indeed it so naturally grows out of what had gone before that it seems to me it would occur to almost every reader, had not a paragraph been unfortunately placed by an uninspired hand at the beginning of the 51st verse.

Again, the language used by the individual addressing Christ indicates something more than a simple avowal of discipleship: "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." This is the language of intimate and devoted friendship. "I will follow thee" is the language of one about to embrace his cause—See Luke ix. 61. The man out of whom the Legion was cast, prayed that he "might be with him." Mark v. 18. Then, calling his disciples, his language was, "follow me." And the Evangelists say, "they arose and and followed him." But this one says "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. Why express himself so fully if there was nothing demanding it.

Again, the reply of Christ, if made at Capernaum, would not strike his disciples with such an overwhelming sense of its truthfulness, and its import, as it would make, when uneasy and houseless, they were actually seeking a place of rest, feeling most severely its need. At Capernaum Jesus had two houses—one with Peter (Mat. viii. 14)—one with Matthew, (Mat. ix. 11.) At these houses of his disciples he no doubt not only had "a place to lay his head," but the very best entertainment their means could afford. This reply indeed made at a time he was enjoying the hospitality of his affectionate disciples could hardly be understood or appreciated by his followers; and being apparently in contradiction to what was then the actual state of affairs, would have required further explanation to enable them to understand it.

From these considerations, I thought that Jesus made that most forcible, beautiful and touching remark upon the night when he had been denied a place "to lay his head," by the Samaritans.

Was it a disciple who said, "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest?" If our view is correct, it must have been a disciple; for it was his disciples who were accustomed to accompany him as he went in the "way." And such sympathy as these words convey, taking Luke's account of the subject, would not be felt or expressed by a stranger. It is the language of intimate friendship, and unwavering devotion. If Jefferson is correct it was a disciple. Because Matthew says, (viii. 24.)—after having given Christ's reply to this individual, "another of his disciples." Language that would not be correct if the one spoken of just before was not a disciple.

THE INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE.

When De Tocqueville was here, he asked to see a Sabbath-school. He was struck with seeing a Bible in the hands of almost every child. "Is this common?" said he to his friend. "What a mighty influence it must have upon the nation."

Think of the innumbered Sabbath-school pupils, in all Christien lands, each a book in their hand. More striking still is the thought of all Christians in all lands, sitting each in their private room, every morning before they go into the world, to read this one book. What must the book be, to furnish the minds and hearts of spiritual people with exhaustless supplies of thought and emotion. Not so Shakspeare; nor even Bunyan, copying so closely from the Bible, can fill such a place. "Do not read Bunyan to me any more," said a distinguished missionary lady, near her end, to her husband; "Bunyan tires me, but I can hear you read the Bible without fatigue."

Why has not Josephus' History of the Jews equal power with this book, when relating the very same thing? Because inspiration has flowed into the very thoughts and language of the Bible. You cannot define it any more than you can anatomize a smile. A quotation, by a public speaker, has power upon his audience which is beyond explanation, except from its supernaturalness.

God, knowing that this book was to be the only source of spiritual thought and life, would not have left it a fallible guide. He who, hanging the earth upon nothing, endowed the North with the mysterious power of magnetism to guide the mariner, has not left the soul without a sure source of information to reach heaven.

But did a man have inspiration in saying some of these very common things! Certainly—to say them just then, and just so, as a part of the great whole. See that rope on the top of the cross, in Ruben's picture. Was Ruben's genius requisite to paint that rope? Could not a common painter have made it? No, Ruben conceived the idea; an ordinary man might not have done so. You might criticise little things in any paintings, or statue, and fritter the whole away. The principles of criticism which some thus apply to the Bible, if taken into the Athenæum gallery, would cause a man to be despised.

Extent of London.—London is rapidly extending its boundaries. It covers an area of 121 square miles, equal to a square of eleven miles to the side. The population in this area amounted in the year 1801 to 958,863, and in the year 1858 to 2,362,336. The London of 1858 is equal to three Londons of 1801. It has now a larger population than the six New England States.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.

Some time before the hour of meeting, the Rev. Drs. Patton, Bacon and Thompson, entered the building, and took seats on the right hand side of the aisle, immediately in front of the stage. The appearance of these champions, and their ranging themselves so deliberately in line, ready, at a moments warning, to pour their charges into the ranks of their more numerous opponents, set all minds to rest as to whether the contest between the anti-slavery and conservative elements of Society were to be renewed. Promptly at nine o'clock the President of the Society, Chief Justice Williams, of Connecticut, with the Rev. Drs. Spring, DeWitt, Olark and others, entered the house and took seats upon the platform.

The Rev. Dr. Spring offered prayer beseeching that whatever was done might be done with an eye single to to the interests of their great redeemer, and that if there were dissenting views that God would so control and direct them that the friends of Zion might work together with a single aim.

The Rev. Dr. DeWitt then made a few remarks, alluding feelingly to the past history of the Society.

After the speaker had concluded, Dr. Magie, of Elizabeth, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the officers of the Society for the ensuing year be the same as for the last year, except that the Hon. W. C. Alexander of New York, be elected a Vice President, and the Rev. Christopher C. Gadsden, of Charleston, S. C., a director in the place of E. F. Backus, Esq., and the Rev. Dr. Johns, deceased.

No sooner had Dr. Magie read this resolution than Mr. S. W. Benedict arose and asked leave to introduce a question which would take precedence of that offered.

The Rev. Mr. Eastman, interrupting the speaker, said that the resolution of Dr. Magie was simply to elect officers with the exception of the Executive Committee.

Mr. Benedict claimed that he had the floor before Dr. Magie's resolution was seconded.

Several Voices.—It was seconded—it was seconded.

The Rev. Mr. Lewis rose to a point of order, as Mr. Benedict was about proceeding. In his opinion the gentleman had no right to interrupt the established order of the Society.

Mr. Benedict thought that this was not the regular method of electing officers. Last year it was not done until late in the afternoon.

Mr. W. C. Prime.—Did the gentleman say Dr. Magie's motion was not seconded?

Mr. Benedict.—I did.

Mr. Prime.—Neither was yours. I seconded Dr. Magie's motion. [Laughter.]

Dr. Murray then stated that he had seconded Dr. Magie's motion immediately on its being offered, and before Mr. Benedict arose.

The Chair therefore decided Mr. Benedict's motion out of order.

Dr. Patton then moved that the resolution under consideration be postponed for the purpose of allowing him to offer one.

Great uproar ensued, with cries of "Question, question."

Dr. Patton.—Go on with your noise, gentlemen; you will not disturb me—not in the least. My father went through the Revolutionary war and—

Several persons rose to points of order, and the Chair finally decided that Dr. Patton must read his resolution without remark.

[Dr. P. then read a preamble and resolution, directing the Publication Committee to issue a tract, calculated to arouse and concentrate the religious sentiment of all evangelical Christians against the slave-trade, and to set forth its wickedness before the nation.]

Hisses and cries of "Question," followed the reading of the resolution. Some one moved that it be tabled.

A voice in the Gallery.—You'd better remember Dr. Spring's prayer down there.

Gentleman hoped that no interruption by lookers-on in the gallery would be allowed.

Dr. Spring urged the assembly to listen to Dr. Patton. No one could differ as to the propriety of doctrines enunciated by his resolution.

The Chair decided that it was contrary to the constitution of the Society to dictate to the Publishing Committee, which was required to give a unanimous vote in favor of all publications issued.

The vote was then taken, on laying Dr. Patton's resolution on the table. A thundering volume of "yeas" rolled out for the affirmative. There were but a few scattering "nays."

The Rev. Mr. Wolcott, of Providence, took the platform, holding in his hand another series of resolutions. He moved to postpone Dr. Magie's resolutions. Just as he was growing quite eloquent with reference to Daniel Webster and the Rock of Plymouth, Col. Alexander of Princeton, N. J., arose. He was exceedingly sorry, he said to interrupt so much eloquence. He had listened with great interest to the speaker, but he would ask whether it was in order to discuss the merits of the resolution at present?

The chair declared it was not in order.

Mr. Wolcott again attempted to speak, but the cries for order and question waxed more and more vociferous, and the Chair put the question on the postponement of Dr. Magie's resolution. The same volume of sound voted against the motion.

The Rev. Dr. Chickering of Portland, offered the following resolution;

Resolved, That the Society now take a recess to allow the Board of Directors to elect the Executive Committee before the religious services commence.

The Rev. Mr. Eastman explained after the motion was adopted who were allowed to vote. He moved that the Chair appoint a Committe to count the votes.

Messrs. A. R. Whetmore, Jaspar, Corning, L. A. Ely, and the Rev. Drs. W. Clark and Hatfield were appointed the Committee.

As the election was proceeding a lively scene took place. The officers of the Society were actively distributing printed tickets, when some one in the body of the house asked what was the "regular" ticket.

Dr. Bacon.—What do you call the "regular" ticket?

Dr. Hewitt proceeded to read the printed ticket.

Dr. Bacon jumped on the platform and asked Dr. Hewitt by what authority he called that the "regular" ticket.

The Chair reminded Dr. Bacon that this was a recess.

Dr. Bacon.—Yes, of the Society to allow the Directors to proceed with an election.

Dr. Hewitt.—Dr. Bacon asked what was the regular ticket.

Dr. Bacon.—I did'nt.

Dr. Hewitt.—You did.

The Chair checked the disputants, and the election proceeded.

John Jay in the mean time stepped upon the platform and asked the Chair to accord him the floor after the result of the election should be declared.

The Chair.—I can make no bargain with you.

The result of the balloting was declared, and the Committees elected, (we omit the names) which committees compose the Executive Committee. They were elected by a vote of 331 to 32 scattering.

The Chair declared the meeting of the Directors ended, and called the Society to order.

John Jay, Esq., then offered a preamble, reciting what was done by the Society in 1857, and instructing Publishing Committees to publish during the coming year, one or more tracts on the moral evils and vices which slavery is known to promote, and which are so much deplored by Evangelical Christians.

Daniel Lord, Esq., in an elaborate and eloquent speech, then proceeded to show the true sphere and the responsibility of the society. In conclusion, said Mr. Lord, "I move as a test question, that the motion of Mr. Jay lie upon the table, and then I hope that for all time hereafter, it will be heard of only in the lamentations of those who mourn for its fate."

Mr. Lord's address, which was in fact an elaborate and studied argument, attracted the closest attention and drew forth the heartiest applause.

When he took his seat, Dr. Thompson asked whether Mr. Lord, by his motion, meant to cut off opportunity for inquiry and debate.

Mr. Lord.—In this popular assembly, Yes.

Dr. Thompson.—When will an opportunity of inquiry be offered?

Mr. Lord.—In the Independent every day.

A perfect storm of applause followed this retort. After the cheers had subsided, laughter continued for some time. The Chair then put the question, and it was carried by an overwhelming vote, amid cries of "gag-law," etc., etc.

Mr. Benedict attempted to appeal, when the Chair decided the motion carried; and Dr. Thompson raised the point of order whether Mr. Jay did not offer his resolution to the Board of Directors, when life members and others voted on it. The Chair stated that he had decided the meeting of Directors adjourned.

Mr. Wolcott then succeeded in offering the resolutions he had previously attempted to submit. The preamble was identical with that offered by Dr. Patton. The resolution appended was—

Resolved, That the publication during the present year, of any well written tract or tracts, which may be offered to the Publishing Committee, calculated to arouse and concentrate the religious sentiments of all Christian men against the Slave trade, and to set forth its great wickedness before the nation, will meet the warm approbation of the Society.

Mr. Wolcott, and Dr. R. W. Clarke, spoke in favor of the resolution, and Hiram Ketchum, Esq., opposed its adoption as unnecessary. The same proportionate vote which had rejected the other resolutions, rejected this.

After the Chair had decided that it was lost, the Rev. Dr. Spring took the stand, and expressed his deep regret that the resolution should have been voted down. He voted in the minority, because he felt they were right. To prevent all misapprehension as to the position which the Society occupies with regard to the question of the Slave trade, he offered the following resolution.

Resolved, That in laying the preceeding resolution on the table, the Society have not come to this conclusion from any doubt in relation to the sin of the African Slave trade, and the great wickedness of renewing that iniquitous traffic in any form.

While Dr. Spring was reducing his resolution to writing, Mr. John Jay got the platform to make an explanation, alleging that all he wanted was that the Society should take its stand on the platform of 1857.

Dr. Van Pelt, from the back part of the room said that he had read in the Book of Leviticus, that God told the Israelites when they wanted slaves to buy them of the heathen. He did not know why what was right formerly was wrong now. [Laughter.]

With reference to the resolution of Dr. Spring, Mr. Ketchum said that the action taken thus far was proper. The Society had nothing whatever to do with the subject under consideration.

Dr. Bacon.—Has it any thing to do with tobacco?

In reply to this question, Dr. Spring offered his tobacco-box to Dr. B., amid the laughter of those who saw the performance.

[Mr. Ketchum offered an amendment to Dr. Spring's resolution when Dr. Bacon took the stage, and made a speech of considerable length.]

Prof. Howard Crosby looked upon Dr. Spring's resolution as a dangerous one. North and South it is known that all the members of the Tract Society are opposed to the Slave trade. If adopted, the resolution would prove the entering wedge on the part of the agitators. The Society would have expressed its views and put them on record on the subject of Slavery, and it could not with ease draw a line to define future action.

Dr. DeWitt thought this might be left to those who are to succeed to guard against.

Dr. Thompson showed how the society had mutilated Gurney's Laws of God in the Heart, by substituting the words "tortures of the inquisition," for "horrors of the Slavetrade," and urged the adoption of the resolution, that the members of the Society might be set right.

The Rev. Mr. Cook, one of the Secretaries of the Society, urged the passage of Dr. Spring's resolution. It was adopted, about twenty voices apparently voting in the negative, while two or three hundred voted affirmatively.

STATISTICS CONCERNING AUSTRIA.

More than twenty dialects are spoken by the people of Austria. German is the official language. According to a classification made in 1846, 15,282,196, or 40 2-3 per cent, of inhabitants belonged to the Slavic race. The Germans numbered 7,917,195, or 21 per cent. The Roman race numbered 8,102,468 or 2 2½ per cent. The Magyars, 5,418,773, or not quite 15 per cent.; the remaining two per cent. consisted of 600,000 Jews, 12,000 Armenians, 18,000 Greeks and 100,000 Gipsies. Three-fourths of the entire population profess the Roman Catholic religion. The members of the Greek Catholic Church are estimated at 6½ millions. The Reformed Protestant Church has 2,280,000. The Lutheran Church, 1,270,000. The Unitarian, 46,000.

Austria abounds in the elements of mineral and agricultural wealth. All the metals except platinum are found in her dominions. The total value of her mineral products in 1851 was estimated at 119,664,781 florins, of forty-nine cents each. The total value of the annual produce of agriculture and cattle breeding is estimated at 1,500,000,000. The annual product in her manufacturing establishments is estimated at $600,000,000. The foreign commerce of Austria, conducted principally at Trieste, amounted in 1857 to 281,932,922 florins, of forty-nine cents each, of imports, and 231,018,109 florins of exports. The Government has latterly made great efforts to develop the material resources of the empire. Many excellent commercial roads have been constructed. Telegraphic lines have been extended in every direction, and in January, 1857, 5185 miles of electro-magnetic telegraph were in operation. Austria contains thirty-five canals, whose aggregate length is about five hundred miles. Steamboats, built on the American pattern, have been introduced on her rivers. Her vessels increased from 5574 in 1841 to 10,006 in 1856, of which 657 were ocean vessels, 68 steamships and 449 large coast vessels

MILBURN, THE BLIND PREACHER.

The "Pulpit and Rostrum" publishes a sermon by the Rev. W. H. Milburn, the blind preacher, formerly chaplain to Congress, now pastor of a Methodist Church in Brooklyn. In an introductory note, the reporter gives a graphic sketch of the preacher, from which we copy:

Scarcely had the subject of these remarks passed the threshold of existence before great misfortune overtook him. In early childhood, from an injury to his eyes, and from medical maltreatment, the power of vision was entirely lost in one eye and very much impaired in the other. How, during many a day, the suffering soul sat by this nearly-closed door, awaiting the messengers of knowledge that with gifts of consolation and joy stepped silently into his darkened chamber, he has himself described in an address delivered at the "Publisher's Festival," held at the Crystal Palace, in New York, in 1855, from which address the following is extracted:

"But wherefore am I speaking at a festival given to literary men—a man who cannot read? No one would cast a shadow, however slight, upon a joyous scene like this. But if a testimony to the worth of knowledge may be wrung from infirmity, surely a further personal allusion may be pardoned.

"Time was when after a fashion I could read, but never with that flashing glance, which instantly transfers a word, a line, a sentence from the page to the mind. It was the perpetration of the child's process, a letter at a time, always spelling, never rending truly. Thus, for more than twenty years, with the shade upon the brow, the hand upon the cheek, the finger beneath the eye, to make an artificial pupil, with beaded sweat, joining with the hot tears trickling from the weak and paining organ, to blister upon the page, was my reading done. Nevertheless, as I have striven to study my native tongue in Shakspeare's dictionary, and eloquence in the well-nigh inspired page of Milton, or endeavored to look through the sightless sockets, yet light-giving mind of Homer upon the plain of Troy; or have set me at the way-side, with solitary Bartimeus, to hear if we could not see the Son of Man, I have found that knowledge is its own exceeding great reward."

In his study of books Mr. Milburn has been so long a time entirely dependant upon the sight of others, that his imagination can scarcely recall the typical appearance of words. In his reading, which usually occupies from five to ten hours a day, the young people of his congregation, and indeed many others throughout the city, are glad to do him service, each coming for that purpose at an appointed day and hour. Thus, by the ministry of others, love alone, he is enabled to devote as much time to study as could well be given by other scholars.

In conversation he is sociable, fraternal, genial, entertaining, and instructive. He can not only talk, but knows how to listen, that is, fully understands the art of conversation. His manners are those which characterize the true gentleman; he is affable, courteous, considerate, kind. For these and other qualities he enjoys the affection of a large circle of warm-hearted friends, including many prominent men of this country and Europe.

Mr. Milburn's preaching may be appropriately called extemporaneous; for, as we learn, having determined the general line of remark on his subject, and having done the necessary reading by the assistance of others, the process of composition is left to the occasion. From long practice and from natural aptitude he is enabled to express his ideas before an audience with as much ease apparently as in private conversation, and with a delicate choice and collocation of words, observing a natural succession of clauses and sentences, and employing the most happy and beautiful illustrations.

So many people, says the New York Observer, probably never before tried in vain to get into the Academy of Music as on Sabbath evening last. The street was thronged by thousands before the doors were opened, and as soon as admittance was gained the house was filled, so that an hour before the time for service to begin, the people were compelled to retire. It is safe to say that fifteen or twenty thousand came to hear the word of life from the lips of the Rev. Mr. Milburn.

He selected for his text two passages in Ecclesiastes: "Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity. Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days."

Living for self and living for others, a life of selfishness and a life of benevolence, living for the creature and living for God, were the contrasted themes of discourse. Solomon tried the former; and when all the joys that wealth, learning, pleasure, pomp, and power could afford, were his, he cried, in the bitterness of his soul, "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity." Then he presented, in this second text, the duty and reward of benevolence; living for others; the life of the Christian; the life of Christ, whose example was held up in glowing and attractive forms, while the beauty and fruit of a life of love in the service of God were presented with great power. The preacher insisted and demonstrated that all philanthrophy, or humanitarianism, that has not the love of Christ for its source and centre, is a miserable delusion and a sham. But to love God with all the heart and our neighbor as ourself, is the whole duty of man. And then he pressed the invitations of the Saviour with great tenderness and earnestness upon the listening thousands; crying out, in tones that floated through every gallery and corridor of the vast hall: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," even the chief of sinners—even you. And with outstretched arms he exclaimed: "O that I could see you—but this is denied me—O that I could look into your eyes and gather inspiration from your bending forms, as you look here to catch these words of eternal life, 'Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.' Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved. Come to the Saviour, O come and say:"

Just as I am without one plea,
But that Thy blood was shed for me,
And that Thou bid'st me come to Thee,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am, and waiting not
To rid my soul of one dark blot;
To Thee, whose blood can cleanse each spot,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am, though tossed about
With many a conflict, many a doubt,
With fears within and foes without,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am, poor, wretched, blind;
Sight, riches, healing of the mind—
Yea, all I need in Thee to find,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am, Thou wilt receive,
Wilt welcome, pardon, cleanse, relieve;
Because Thy promise I believe,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am, Thy love unknown
Has broken every barrier down;
Now to be thine, yea, thine alone,
O Lamb of God, I come!

This sketch gives no conception of the manner or matter of the sermon. The preacher is an earnest, natural orator, chaste and polished in his thought and expression, with a clear, strong voice and graceful, energetic action, thoroughly evangelical in his theology, but inclined to the intellectual rather than the emotional in his argument, he reaches the affections and conscience through the understanding, and closes with a tender and subduing appeal.

THE DEATH OF DE TOCQUEVILLE.

One of the most illustrious writers of France, whose name is familiar to American readers, has passed away. Alexis Clerel De Tocqueville died recently at his residence, near Lannes. He was a great-grandson of the famous philosopher, Malesherbes, and was born on the 29th of July, 1805. After completing his legal studies at Paris he for some time practiced in the courts, where his professional knowledge and acumen procured for him in 1826 the appointment of Judge of Instruction at Versailles. In 1831 he visited the United States, in company with Emile de Beaumont, for the purpose of reporting on the penitentiary system of this country. But DeTocqueville gave a larger scope to his observations, and the result of them was a philosophic work on the Institutions and society of the United States, called "Democracy in America," which raised him at once to the front rank among philosophic political speculators. Not since Montesquieu had written on the Spirit of Laws, or De Lolme on the British Constitution, had so profound, intelligent, and thorough an analysis appeared of the political organism of any nation. In several of his details of facts, and in many of his generalizations, De Tocqueville fell into errors; or at least he did not view the workings of Democracy as we are in the habit of receiving them at home. But the spirit of his work was liberal, his thought deep and exhaustive, and his general conclusions flattering to the good sense and to the morals of Democracy. Numberless reviews of his book appeared in all the Journals of the civilized world, it was translated into various European languages, and it served much to raise the United States in European estimation.

In 1836 De Tocqueville received from the French Academy the Montegon prize, and the next year was made a member. He served in the Chamber of Deputies as the representative of a part of the department of La Manche from 1839 to 1848, for most of the time in moderate opposition to the Government of Louis Philippe. During the Republic that followed he was the Envoy of France to the Conference at Brussels. Louis Napoleon, after his usurpation, appointed him to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, but he was not satisfied with the policy of that monarch, and soon resigned his place. In the Legislative Assembly the ex-Minister at once took a position on the benches of the Opposition. On the 2d December, 1851, he was one of the Deputies who met to protest against the coup d'etat. Imprisoned, with his principal associates, he was presently set at liberty, and finally withdrew to private life.

The intervals of his leisure De Tocqueville occupied in the composition of a treatise on "The Ancient Regime and the Revolution," the first volume of which was issued in 1856; and translated into English by Henry Reeve, of London, and Mr. Bonner, of this city. It was designed to be a complete elucidation of the changes effected in French politics and society by the great outbreak of the eighteenth century. The materials were drawn from original sources in the archives of the departments and the towns, and gave a fresh and interesting insight into the local life of the provinces, both during the revolution and during the long period by which it was prepared. De Tocqueville's fundamental idea was that the great political curse of France was the centralization of government, and he endeavored to show that this had not been the work of the revolutionary leaders, but of the monarchs who had preceded them, and that the violence of the outbreak of 1789 was only proportioned to the previous repression. As his book was unfinished, it is to be hoped that he has left behind him the materials for its completion.—N. Y. Evening Post.

SOUTH WESTERN LOUISIANA.

Rev. B. F. White, of the Louisiana Conference, writes to the Memphis Advocate, from Opelousas, as follows:

"Our lands here produce from one to one and a half bales of cotton per acre; and from one to two and a half hogsheads of sugar. If they are in search of cheap land, this is the place to find it. There is as good land as is in the Union here, that can be purchased at six dollars per acre. The prices range from 1¼ dollars per acre to 20 dollars, according to quality of land, and improvements. I'll give a sample of a trade that can be made, viz: four hundred acres of land, all arable, two hundred under fence, with moderate improvements, for 2,500 dollars; 1,000 dollars cash, the balance, on one and two years credit. On this place last year, three hands made thirty-two bales of cotton, and a plenty of corn and meat for the place. Places from 50 to 5,000 acres can be had on equally reasonable terms. If they desire healthy locations, I can safely say, that it is by far the healthiest country that I have ever seen. I believe that it is as healthy as any part of the Union. We have no real cause for disease, enjoy almost continually the Gulf breeze, which is very healthy and invigorating. I have been in the state about 2½ years with a family of six members, and we have not had a chill or a fever in the family. It requires great imprudence to render one sickly here. We are entirely above the overflows. Are they philanthropists, and do they desire to situate themselves for greater usefulness? If so by all means they should come right here. The fields are truly broad and inviting, but alas! the laborers are very few. This country is cursed with ignorance and superstition, and common humanity demands relief. We have especial need of young men of good English education, and deeply piety, as teachers of our public schools, which pay from forty to seventy-five dollars per month. We also have great need of deeply pious and intelligent local preachers. Good pious intelligent mechanics would do well here. This country is especially inviting to enterprising men.

OUR MINISTERS.

We learn from Washington letters, that both Mr. Dallas and Mr. Mason, our Ministers to England and France, have signified their willingness to return to the United States whenever the President desires to fill their places. If there is any change made at all, it will probably occur soon after the meeting of Congress. On this subject the Washington correspondent of Charleston Mercury, says: "There has appeared at different times reports of the desire of the Executive to change the incumbency of the foreign missions of the United States, especially at the French and English courts. Mr. Buchanan has refrained from removing the Hon. George M. Dallas, in accordance with an agreement with their mutual friends prior to the last Presidential nomination. Mr. Mason's friends are powerful, and have resisted any efforts to remove him or to induce him to resign. The President is now more anxious to effect a change in our representation in France and England since the new aspect which the political world has assumed. To this end quite an effort is now being made in Louisiana to obtain for the Hon. George Eustis the position of United States Senator, in place of Mr. Slidell, who will be appointed to the mission of France. It has frequently been reported that Mr. Slidell would be appointed to the post, but it has only within a few days become a resolve of the President to make the appointment."

The Population of the United States increases a million a year, or two thousand every day.

LUCID INTERVALS OF THE SOUL.

It was said of a poor man, who had been delivered by the word of the Redeemer from the dominion of the evil one, by way of describing his new condition, that he was "clothed, and in his right mind." It was noticeable and thank-worthy that he was "clothed," and presented the appearance of a decent and civilized man; for hitherto he had been a madman, driven out from home and society, and despoiled of the decency of manhood. But it was much more solemnly and joyfully memorable, that he was "in his right mind;" for the relations and sympathies of his soul, with the kindred spirits and spiritualities of heaven and earth, made its civilization much more important and valuable than the civilization of his body. The power of the grace of God had granted unto him a "lucid interval" in the midst of his grief and distraction, and, coming to "cry and cut himself with stones," he left "the mountains and the tombs," whither he had fled in hatred of all the charities of human brotherhood, and running to Jesus, who appeared to his vision in this new light—"the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely"—"he fell down at his feet and worshipped him."

All souls, even the worst, have their lucid intervals—moments—perhaps hours—sometimes days and weeks—in which the cloud of habitual spiritual darkness is lifted up, and the splendor and power of an intellectual and moral transfiguration fall upon the uncovered crown of the spirit: when the soul lifts up its eyes in the newly-revealed light of heaven, like a bare-headed child in the sunshine of a spring morning. Once in awhile, after the selfish and wearisome toils of the day, the most worldly and unappreciative people look up to the calm blue heavens, studded with the beauteous singing stars—

"——singing, as they shine,
The hand that made us is divine."

And the exclamation is, "O how beautiful! It surely never was so beautiful before!" Likewise, there are times when we forget, for the time, worldly interests, earthly griefs and vexations, and all the hateful and unhappy passions; and the firmament of the heavenly and divine seems to be revealed in the purer spiritual atmosphere of the moment—and all the blessed virtues and graces rise into the horizon in all their transcendently charming lustre. Sorrow for past unbelief and sin, and regret for unnecessary and self-imposed unhappiness, then struggle for the mastery in our souls, with the joy of new faith, and hope, and determination. God is then revealed to us as only good, his truth firm as the everlasting hills, his promises "yea and amen;" and our fellow-men, including our enemies, appear to us in the spirit of true brotherhood—only to be loved, and pitied, and helped.

But, the great thought and lesson of all this is, the improvement of these "times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord"—these "things that belong unto our peace." The running to Jesus and worshipping him, this was the pivot of that lever of power that lifted the poor demoniac out of the grasp of the devil. The idea is, run to Jesus whenever you can get a glimpse of him.

CULTIVATING THE SENSE OF RESPONSIBILITY.

Here we are, on this beautiful Monday morning, fresh from the quiet blessedness of God's Sabbath, introduced again to the noise and din and strife of this working and struggling world. Here we are, met on every side with objects that appeal to the senses, stir the passions, and call forth the heartiest energy of human activity. Here we are, confronted with the stern facts of life and duty, feeling and knowing that to-day will make on us a mark never to be obliterated—that to-day we shall speak words never to be forgotten, and perform deeds that at the instant of their doing shall enter into our immortality, and be the inseparable inheritance of our souls through the great ages to come.

Look at this truth, and say if the human mind can conceive of any thing more impressive, more affecting, more startling. No man can imagine two mental states more unlike than those in which this doctrine is firmly held and practically enforced, or in which it is either utterly disbelieved or thoughtlessly neglected. It is a truth of most momentous meaning, because it gives meaning to every thing else. In one way or another it must operate with a power transcending all other force, and, for good or evil, nothing can hinder it from shaping character and life in accordance with its tremendous influence. To obey it is to consecrate ourselves to God; to resist it is to harden the heart to all goodness, to drive away the Holy Ghost from our hearts, and to pursue a course of conduct in which every step prepares the way for a farther and a more reckless inroad into the regions of awaiting sorrow and death. Between these two inevitable results there is no middle-ground. Talk as we may of the vastness of the Universe, there are but two worlds to us, viz: Heaven and Hell. And every day we live sends our life forward into the bosom of one or the other. The earth may take the momentary impress of our steps, but the indelible foot-prints are elsewhere. And the encircling air may catch our tones and vibrate to our words, but the great echo-gallery, where the sound of the soul is caught, and where the voice of the judgment is gathering its terrible emphasis, is beyond the firmament. Surely, then, life is a momentous affair. Every hour has a meaning that no human mind is adequate to comprehend, and the sum of existence, made up from a thousand contributary sources, and its final import fixed by things that have perhaps been utterly overlooked, can only be fully understood, amid the light of an eternal world.

Responsibility is therefore a matter of faith. Its true extent, its awful risks, are not to be measured by reason, by calculation of consequences. No; God alone knows the solemnity of that vast trust which has been committed to our keeping. Probation is under a vail. Eternity is hidden. And this is best. For it gives us an opportunity to cultivate responsibility on the ground of faith and not of sense, on the truth of God's word and not on the foundation of our imperfect understanding. A sense of responsibility, therefore, is one main point of self-culture. And it is only to be fully attained by cultivating all our faculties. Faith accepts the principle. But the whole intellect, the whole heart, the will and the conscience, must be concerned in the growth and development of the sentiment. Truth alone cannot form it. Sensibility alone cannot form it. Conscience alone is inadequate to the work. All must join—all must be tributary to this deep, poignant, absorbing idea of responsibility to God.

Now, this truth needs a high enthronement in the mind. Too many think that their intellectual improvement has nothing to do with a sense of responsibility. This is a great mistake. Many a good man would be a far better man, if he had more intelligence. Responsibility is in the soul, and hence all the soul ought to be awakened and brought into fulness of action, if a man would serve God in the measure of true manhood. Here is one, who neglects his imagination. Here is another, who never disciplines his reason. Here is a third, who is indifferent to the enlargement of his sympathies. Here is a fourth, who settles down into himself as himself was twenty years since. All such are sinning against their own souls. Every one of their faculties is essential to the idea of capacity, and capacity is the basis and ground of responsibility. The very thing that a man neglects may be the very thing most needed by God's blessing to make him a most needful and effective man. This is a deeply impressive fact. Think of it, brother-man, think of it. The avenue that you have closed up may be the avenue through which the Holy Ghost might have made to you its most glorious revelations.

THE PULPIT AND RELIGIOUS PRESS.

A POOR SERMON, and a poor religious newspaper, are two of the poorest things ever imposed upon the poor people of this poor world. A sermon without thought and without study—without earnestness and without spiritual power—without the vitality of gospel truth and without the inspiration of the Holy Ghost—such a sermon is a poor sermon. A religious newspaper loosely, lazily, lamely edited—without judgment, taste, and appropriateness in the selections—without ability, point, spirit, and readableness in the contributions—without power, beauty, and popular sympathy in the editorials—without a judicious digest of important current intelligence—without beauty of typography and taste in arrangement—such a religious newspaper—if such a thing can be called religious—is a poor one.

Such things degrade the pulpit and the religious press. The lawyer and politician exceed the one, and the various secular newspapers the other, in popular interest and power. Whereas, the pulpit has the grandest elements of sublime energy—the grandest sources of inspiration—the deepest fountains of sympathy—of any oral institution known among men. And the religious press has similar superior advantages. A sanctified emulation—a spirit of holy enterprise—a God-fearing desire to excel—are very much needed in both—more, perhaps, in the latter than in the former. A pulpit invested with the true charm and attraction of the gospel—so that "great multitudes" flock to its ministrations—is a delideratum; and so is a powerfully popular religious press.

Whitefield, Irving, Chalmers, Robert Hall, and many now living—indeed, all spiritual preachers, great and small—have illustrated the true idea of the pulpit; but the "coming man" of the religious press, is still "he that should come." But "the time cometh." "He that shall come will come, and will not tarry," if such scripture may be used in such an accommodated sense. The latter-day dispensation of the religious press is at hand. Cotton is king of commerce; the secular press is king in the realm of popular intelligence and public opinion; but the religious press is destined to "restore the kingdom" of Christian civilization, and reign as the supreme mental and moral power of the earth.

It is now, by habit and prejudice, shut up to the Judaism of exclusive ecclesiastical, theological, and religious topics and intelligence. But the "vision" of "Joppa" begins to appear in a wider significance than Peter ever knew, teaching that "all manner" of legitimate interests, philosophies, sympathies, aptitudes, and tendencies—as inseparable from mental and moral life as are "four-footed beasts, fowls of the air, and creeping things" from animal life—are to be introduced into the religious press of the new dispensation; teaching that "the fulness of these gentile" departments of thought and activity, heretofore banned by it, as "common and unclean" secularities, are to be "brought in" and sanctified—baptized and consecrated to God. Piety, genius, and literary culture, are not always to seek independent and antagonistic channels of communication—not always to run on "opposition lines." Each will find its complement in union with the others, and all will pour their united gospel upon the heart and mind of the world through the mediatorial ministry of the religious press. Increasing millions of population—increasing desire for intelligence and culture—increasing means of communication—increasing piety and religious power—are indices and elements of the increasing circulation and power of the religious press.

ANOTHER TRIUMPH OF BAPTIST PRINCIPLES.

It is a duty to "rejoice in the truth." If the opportunity is denied to rejoice in the "whole truth," why, then, rejoice in what there is of it left. It is always a triumph of truth when conscience, against policy and public opinion, is strong enough to bring about practical fidelity to doctrinal profession. It is simply "holding fast the profession of our faith without wavering"—not "loving the praise of men more than the praise of God." This triumph of truth to conscience is not destroyed, though the conscience be in error. It is narrow, but true.

Our Baptist brethren have always held that the rest of us are not in the Church at all not having been immersed, and therefore they have, in logical consistency with that belief, shut us out from the communion. They have, however, been wofully and weakly inconsistent and reproach-worthy in acknowledging unimmersed men as ministers of the gospel, when they would not acknowledge them as members of the Church. This they have done by inviting them to preach in their pulpits, and in recognizing their ministry in various ways. Occasionally a heroic "land-marker" would stand up for honesty and consistency, but they have generally been frowned down.

Our sympathies have always been with them, however; for we do admire a man that stands by general principles, and will not dodge the logical consequences that grow out of them. There is some philosophy, and logic, and conscience, and pluck in such a man; and such elements are always hopeful. Progress can never be stereotyped—civilization can never be stereotyped—while such men live. If they are wrong in their premises, there is some hope that they will come right. That is the way the germ gets its head out of the mud and manure into the beauteous glow of the sunshine. The idea is to go straight through. The expediency men are the most amiable inanities and non-entities imaginable. They are vexatiously hopeless, and graciously good for nothing.

One of these land-markers was invited to preach in a Presbyterian pulpit in Memphis, and after entering it, declared that, according to his conscientious principles, he could not invite the pastor—who, with his congregation, was present—to take a seat in the pulpit with him. The poor fellow stirred a storm about his ears, and was soundly abused, even by Baptists. But he was right, according to the Baptist platform. We admired his bravery. Would that all Baptist ministers were as true to principle as he. But the number of such is hopefully increasing.

At the recent Southern Baptist Convention at Richmond, Va., a body representative of the whole Southern Baptist Church, Rev. D. P. Bestor (it was just like him, for he is a model christian gentleman) offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President tender the preachers of other denominations of christians, the regard and the respect of this Convention, and invite them to a seat upon the Convention floor.

"Mr. Bestor explained that his object in this motion was one of pure courtesy and good will, such as should, among all mortal christians, be cherished as the moral duty of soldiers of the cross, whose missions, in all denominations, were to lead their fellow-beings to eternal salvation.

"Mr. Hurt moved that this resolution be laid upon the table, and a division was called for on this motion, which was lost by 100 against 128.

"A rather animated debate arose, and was carried on with much feeling, on the aim or acceptance of Mr. Bestor's resolution. After some talk for and against, a motion was made and carried to allow the original question to be withdrawn by Mr. Bestor, for the sake of harmony among the members of the Convention."

We rejoice at the result. The only inconsistency—and it was sad one—was the "dodge" of voting leave to withdraw, instead of voting down, the motion. But our motto is, to "rejoice in the truth," what there is of it. Of course, the immersion premise which forces our Baptist brethren to such unhappy results, is all wrong—every body outside (and some inside) of the Baptist Church knows that. But the law should be enforced while it exists.

It will thus be repealed the sooner, if wrong. It is true, we were not quite prepared for this "Dred Scott decision" of the "Supreme (Baptist) Court," that Pedo-Baptists are not entitled to recognition of citizenship in the realm of "pure courtesy and good will. But the decision has become the law of the Baptist land, and we submit. Go on, brethren, go on! "There is a better time a coming."

"By the grace of God we'll meet you,"
"On Canaan's Happy shore," where Christ shall be the Judge, and make the Decisions.

Our brother of the Southern Christian Advocate proposes that Pedo-Baptists reciprocate this refusal of ecclesiastical recognition, and of "pure courtesy and good-will!" Oh no! Never! This would make us as inconsistent as Baptists have heretofore been. Let us not become inconsistent because they have become consistent. This is a probationary state, and full of temptations. "Jordan is a hard road to travel," but it must be traveled, it seems. We wish all "weary waederers" in that way, God-speed; and when we have the opportunity of "entertaining" one of these "strangers," in a pulpit that is wide enough for all God's faithful ministers, of whatever name, we shall be most happy to do so.

THE CHURCH AND TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES.

We have received a communication in reply to an editorial in this paper, on the subject of the Church and temperance societies. We respectfully decline its publication, for the reason that its philosophy distinctly sets forth the unscriptural doctrine, that "the word of life," as "held forth" by the Christian Church, is not only inefficient as the great instrumentality for the reformation and salvation of the world, but far inferior, in certain respects, to certain human associations. This paper not only cannot endorse, but cannot be the medium of the communication of such philosophy.

It also assails the Church as guilty of great sins, simply because of the infirmities and inconsistencies of certain specimens of fallen humanity who happen, occasionally, here and there, to be connected with her. This paper is intended to strengthen the Church in her work of faith and labor of love, and not to assail her, or be the medium of assault upon her.

The man who loses faith in the Church because all who are connected with her are not perfect, has no just conception of the mission of the Church. Heaven, and not the Church, is the place where none but the immaculate are allowed to reside. The Church is to go out into "the high-ways and hedges," and bring in "the poor, the maimed, the halt, and the blind;" and its society is bound, always, to be "mixed" and not "select".

The Apostles had to deal with much more imperfection and sin—in the Church in their day—than is common to the Church in this day. And yet they did not give up the Church, but sought to improve her members. They instituted no preliminary institution, as a kind of hospital, where people might be morally healed, preparatory to presenting them the gospel. They did not take the ground that any portion of the heathen and Jewish masses of unbelievers and sinners could "not be reached by the gospel," until a pioneer human evangelism had prepared the way.

The gospel of Jesus Christ is no such cumbrous car that it requires "big roads" to be cut into the wilderness of humanity before it can travel. On the contrary it is better adapted than any other instrumentality for the reformation of all possible classes of society, and for deliverance from all possible sins. It is divinely instituted—for this very purpose—and it has divine power in it—and nothing else has. And the man who loses this faith, loses a fundamental element of the faith of a Christian. If the Christian religion cannot save the world, nothing can. We believe it can, and intend to devote our days to its dissemination.

We do not now, nor did we in our first article, oppose any temperance association. Far be it from us. Let all men do good as best they can. The talk of "arraying the Church in opposition" to them, is gratuitous and idle. The Church has more valuable work. We simply speak for ourselves and for the Church, and do not dictate to others. Why should others wish to dictate to the Church? Away with this modern higher-lawism that demands of the Church what Christ never demanded.

But this we say:—all the energies of Christian men and women, all their energies of mind, heart, character, money, position—should be consecrated to God, to be used as he shall direct for the salvation of the world. The Church should be the channel of communication, and the instrument of power. Any unnecessary division of sympathy and energy, weakens faith in the gospel, destroys integrity and force of Christian character, enfeebles Christian instrumentalities, denies to God his own, defrauds the world of sanctified influence, and builds up the philosophy of a partial moral civilization, instead of a thorough Christian civilization.

HARMONY OF SOUTHERN METHODISM.

The absence of partyism and strife in the councils and constituencies of the Southern Methodist Church, is a just cause of pride and pleasure. Without exaggeration and without boasting, we may truly say of our people, in the language of inspired poetry, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" There is a remarkably small degree of difference of opinion among us. Since apostolic days, we soberly believe, this element of harmony has not, in any body of christians, existed to a greater extent.

In all the essentials of christian doctrine and experience, we are an absolute unit. This, however, is not peculiar to our branch; it is common to Methodism throughout the world. We believe we are not at all enthusiastic in the opinion that such perfect unity in all the general principles, and practical and experimental details, of theoretical and personal godliness, has never been known outside of Methodism. The probabilities of its continuance are supported by all the evidences known to history and philosophy. Between all the ecclesiastical branches of Methodism, this will ever remain an unbroken bond of union and sympathy. Every where, the preaching, worship, and experience of Methodists, is, and will be, the same.

But while such a unity as this is common to Methodism, unity of opinion and feeling in reference to ecclesiastical policy and prudential administration, is, we believe, peculiar to Southern Methodism. Not only is there little difference of opinion; there are, also, a conservative unity of aim, and a charitable and courteous recognition of individual freedom and right, where differences of opinion chance to exist. Existing differences of opinion are either of such unimportant character, or the conservatism of charity and courtesy is so strong, or the influence of both elements is so prevalent, that no particular view has served as the creed and cohesive bond of a party.

One of the strongest elements of our denominational harmony is the harmony of our denominational press. Controversy and rivalry are unknown between Southern Methodist newspapers; with, perhaps, a single exception as to each count—the result of strong but not well-balanced zeal—which found no favor—and which, it is hoped, will never again be known to Southern Methodist history. The unity of the Church depends more upon the harmony of her press than upon any thing else. An inharmonious, warring press is a curse to any church. Should it ever exist among us, let the law of Louis Napoleon be brought to bear upon it. Independence of utterance is compatible with harmony of spirit, and free and brotherly discussion does not necessitate bitter controversy.

There is also among us an almost entire absence of controversy and personal warfare, in our papers, between our leading men and General Conference officials, who happen to entertain different views of policy and administration. Harmony here is next to harmony in the editorial corps. Departure from this conservative course is to be deprecated and discouraged by all. Some cropping out of this evil indicate the necessity of a little attention at this point. May we always walk by the same rule, and mind the same things.

EMINENT INSTANCE OF EDITORIAL CANDOR.

THE South Western Baptist, noticing the increased demand among Baptists for Gill's Commentary, which Robert Hall compliment as "a continent and"—a highly Calvinistic work—says that such demand "is an evidence of the decline of Arminianism in the Baptist Churches, and of a return to the doctrine of justification by faith without the deeds of the law."

Such candor is refreshing in these degenerate days of denominational partisanship. An acknowledgment that Arminianism is prevalent "in the Baptist Churches" was hardly to be expected. An acknowledgment that Arminianism, which specifically teaches that "we are accounted righteous before God only on account of the merit of our Lord Jesus Christ by faith"—and that "justification by faith is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort"—an acknowledgement, we repeat, that Arminianism, as soon as it is "immersed," and enters the close communion pale, becomes so perverted thereby as to renounce "fellowship" with its peculiar doctrine of "justification by faith"—was still less to be expected.

But the crowning triumph of editorial candor is yet to be recorded, and we make the entry with the eager hope that our paper will be the first to carry the glad news to a delighted world—thus establishing, by one grand fact, the reputation of which we are, we trust, laudably emulous—that of being the best "religious news"-paper in the land. This triumph of candor is to be found in the implied acknowledgment that Baptists, in returning from the Baptist Arminianism of "justification by the deeds of the law," jump clean over the old Calvinistic-Baptist doctrine of "justification by the imputation of the personal righteousness of Christ," and land safely upon the Methodist Arminianism of "justification by faith, without the deeds of the law." Give us your hand, brother! We always had hope of you, even "against hope." We always believed there was "come out" in you, and now the sorely-tried faith of long dreary years is most gloriously vindicated. Who will give up a Baptist editor after this? Not we.

REFUSING TO BE COMFORTED.

OUR NORTHERN CONTEMPORARIES, the religious ones especially, are in great horror at the accounts given in Southern religious papers at the dispersion, by the people, of the Arkansas Conference of the Northern Methodist Church, which met at Bonham, Texas. This paper comes in for a share of the sentiment represented by the "lifting of the hands that hang down," but our brother of Texas is honored with "distinguished consideration" in this connection. It is necessary for their peace and quiet that our Northern brethren become certainly assured of the fact that their "holy horror" over our nonconformity to their standard of sentiment is of no manner of importance with us. We love our Northern brethren—we love Bishop Janes—but we know how to treat incendiarism—to protect the morals of our servants—to pray, practically, "that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty"—and we find no sort of trouble as to the compatibility of these respective duties of the citizen and christian. Come, brethren, take it quietly. We mean you no harm, but good. We are, in fact, seeking the union of all the Methodists in America by resisting what is unmethodistic in some of the branches. Send Bishop Janes to New Orleans, and we will give him the fullest of houses to hear him preach. But we cannot permit him, as a President of a Conference among us, to entertain incendiary resolutions. Put abolitionism away from your Discipline and your church councils, and let us all reunite upon a scriptural basis. Preaching to the negroes on some of our plantations would be a means of grace to many of your preachers. Let us unite, after the "old things are passed away," and "the glory of this latter house" would far exceed the glory of the former one.

NORTHERN METHODIST SECESSIONS.

A WRITER in the Cambridge (Md.) Democrat, published in the bounds of the Philadelphia Conference, who is a member of the Northern Methodist Church, proposes a State Convention to organize a secession to the Southern Church, in consequence of the abolition agitation in their own. He denounces the Sunday School Advocate, very justly, as an abolition sheet. He contends that the connection of Maryland Methodists with the Northern Church is disgraceful to them. He argues that slavery is an institution recognized by Christ. He says that in his county there is but one sentiment among Methodists on the subject. He proposes to tell the Northern preachers they are not wanted, and to turn the keys of the Churches upon them if they attempt to occupy the pulpits.

In this connection it may be proper to remind our readers that the Baltimore Christian Advocate has already denounced the Northern Methodist Book Concern as an abolition concern. Baltimore Methodists have always been in a false position, in consequence of bad leaders; it remains to be seen whether she has now a leader equal to the time and the occasion.

In St. Louis, where the Northern Methodists have been trying to plant themselves, and where they publish a paper at a dead loss of several thousand dollars per annum, they have had one feeble society for some time. Last winter they had a revival under the labors of a Rev. Dr. Redfield. A difficulty between the pastor and part of the church, on one side, and Dr. Redfield and the majority, on the other, induced the latter to set up for themselves; and we learn recently that they have joined the Southern Church.

In the Advocate of the 4th inst., is a notice from Rev. B. F. White, addressed to "Members of the Louisiana Conference"—asking them to raise $10 to $20 each, and forward the same to him at Opelousas, to aid in paying a debt that is hanging over a church of ours at Washington, St. Landry Parish. That debt ought to be paid; and brethren and friends may be assured that they will be doing a good deed, at the right time, by responding at an early day to the call made.

As it seems that this money is to come mainly from sources outside of Washington, and as some may not care to send contributions unless they can know that the church debt there will be certainly paid, I would suggest that brethren disposed to aid Bro. White, in his laudable undertaking, find out at once, what they can do, or, what they are willing to pledge; and let him know the amount. And when a sufficient sum is subscribed, he can announce it through the Advocate, and every man can then pay up—and have the satisfaction of knowing at the same time, that he is giving to a church that is certainly to be freed from debt by his so doing. On these terms I pledge to Bro. White the sum of $20.

In other years, the only place the writer could find to preach in at Washington, was in ball-room. Now the little flock there—few and feeble—have a church; but it is in debt, and they are unable to pay. Let me ask the readers of this, shall their house of worship be taken from them, and turned into a "theatre or ball-room" for want of one, five or ten dollars from each of you? Surely not. Please then write to Bro. White, or tell the preacher in your region first time you see him what you are willing to give, that he may set it down and call on you for the amount at the proper time. What member or friend of the church will speak first to the preacher? I wait a little to hear from the folks on my circuit.

ON Tuesday, the 27th of April, at 5 P. M., we left New Orleans on the steamer Lecompte for Shreveport. As we ascended the Mississippi, we realized how just the fears entertained of a general overflow. The waters were higher than during the freshet of last year—the most disastrous ever known—and only need to rise an inch or two more to flood the entire bottom. The idea of embanking such a volume of water—swollen, ever and anon, by the rivers that run into it and by the rains of heaven falling on a dozen States, considered as an experiment, would be pronounced wild, chimerical, and yet it seems to be practicable. The levees on either bank are confining this tremendous current, and, despite an occasional crevasse, are protecting the fields and flocks of the planters from submersion and ruin. In the progress of the country, I have no doubt the time will come, when these alluvial bottoms will be denuded of timber, and the sugar-cane and cotton plant wave instead, and on each side, the home of the master and the habitations of his servants will so multiply as to make a continuous town for a thousand miles. Lands will be divided like city lots in the partition of estates—with forty or fifty acre fronts—running back according to the capital and necessities of the proprietor. All along this great artery of commerce, money and taste will rear architectural wonders—the lordly mansion—the less imposing, but more beautiful cottage—and vines and gardens and trees will embosom a population, rich, refined, (oh! that history may add,) religious.

Our first night was dark and stormy—I might say tempestuous. We made very slow progress and were very glad to hail the morning light. The Lecompte is a slow boat, but her commander, Capt. Johnson, I can recommend as a prudent and safe officer. The lives of his passengers are precious in his sight, and with him are secure as they could be in human hands.

For the first time in my experience—I found Red River low and falling, but still high enough for easy navigation. We reached Shreveport on Saturday night, and there spent the Sabbath, preaching both morning and evening. The people were present in large numbers, and seemed to give earnest attention to the word spoken. May their profiting appear in future time!

The travel westward is heavy. Two extra stages left on Sabbath morning, each full of passengers. The regular line left on Monday, but I was crowded out and had to hire a conveyance to Marshall—the agent assuring me that I should be provided for from that point. We got in next morning in time for the stage, but not time enough to see my old friends. We took passage for Henderson, and had as pleasant travel as a crowded vehicle on a very hot day would allow. In fact, in all my wanderings I never struck a more agreeable crowd. One gentleman, who had been over the plains, encouraged us much as to the prospects of our journey. He thinks there is no danger, and that the discomforts are not greatly to be dreaded. He gave me much useful information as to my outfit, and I hope to profit by his suggestions.

Supping at Henderson, we passed on to Rusk, arriving in due time next morning. Spent two days with my sister and her deceased husband's family, and then took up the line of march for San Antonio.

After much debate and various opinions from those best informed, I took the route by Palestine, Waco and Austin to San Antonio, expecting to go through expeditiously—but have been sadly disappointed. We started with a stage and four horses; at Palestine, after stopping all night, we dwindled to an inferior hack and two horses. Nevertheless, we moved along, maintaining about the same speed as when we had more locomotive power. At the end of fifty miles we cast anchor again, and lodged for day.

With a vastly improved vehicle and rapid horses we sped over the prairies for fifteen miles, and driving up to the "stand," hailed, but no answer came. Dismounting, we examined the stable, and found neither hostler nor steeds. On inquiring at a house near by, we learned that the corn and fodder were exhausted, and that the horses had been turned out to graze and could not be found.

The postal arrangements of the country are deranged somewhat, and I suppose contractors and agents must be forgiven for landing passengers in the middle of a prairie without horses to carry them on. All hands save myself, turned out to hunt up the lost. I tried to sleep and forget.

In about two hours they all returned, hot and weary, having found but one of the span. Taking one who had just run his race and the found one, we prepared to start once more. Both horses refused to pull, but presently were persuaded to their duty. We went off at a pace too fast to endure, and at the first little hill we halted, but not till we reached the top. After coaxing and pushing, we got off once again; accomplished several miles and then bunked for an hour. Is any thing more provoking than a horse when he takes "the studs?" I had reproved the driver for swearing, in the morning, and under this provocation he restrained himself finely. At last, turning to me, he said—"you rebuked me for swearing at the stand, but this is enough to make a preacher curse. It would relieve me mightily to curse these horses, and the contractor who put them on the road." "Have patience my good fellow, cursing will not start them." I got out to drive, while a fellow-passenger led, and the driver pushed the stage upon the horses. At last they moved—but in a mile they stopped again. Alas! alas! This time we halted in a bottom of mud and sand, and well nigh despaired of ever moving again. I went off in search of help, and to my joyful surprise on getting half way back, found they had started. Finally we reached the stand—glad enough to part with the beasts which had worried us so much.

We heard all along that, more than likely, one could not cross Tahuachana creek; and the driver who always spoke according to his impulses, took the most discouraging view of things, and professed to speak from personal knowledge. He was inclined to stop, affirming that if the water had gone down, it was impossible to climb the opposite bank. We insisted upon going on and seeing for ourselves. Late in the afternoon we reached the dreaded creek, and found it about knee deep. The banks were very steep and high, nearly perpendicular, and slick with slimy mud. Of course we had to dismount.

A fellow passenger took Mrs. P. and our little daughter down the stream to a log crossing, while I remained to help the driver lock his wheels, and descend to the water's edge, where I was to get in, cross, and be ready to help up on the other side. Fortunately a creole living not far off, came down to assist if necessary, and we found him very serviceable. The descent was so steep that the driver could not control the horses, and accordingly they carried the stage beyond my reach. In this dilemma the creole proposed to carry me over on his back; so I mounted him and rode over. On going down to help Mrs. P. over the log, I found it too high and narrow for a safe transit. To cross on it safely would have taxed the nerves of a cooe. I recommended all parties to go back to the ford and ride my creole. This was agreed upon, and the descent and passage was effected amid no little merriment. While the creole was slipping and catching under his burden—he would cry out, "do not be alarmed madam, Billy is a safe horse, and will take you over dry shod." To little Ann the incidents of the day were very entertaining, and will be chronicled in her memory as "the funny passage of the Tahuachana in Texas."

On our arrival at Waco, we found that we had to lie over a day. So we rested, wrote letters, and at night I preached. During the day I saw a novel scene. A herd of six hundred beeves, driven by Mexicans riding their Spanish ponies, arrived. The Brazos was very full, and the cattle very reluctant to take water. The herdsmen, however, with whips and shouts urged them on; after a few stampedes, those in front plunged in, the rest followed in quick succession, and presently a forest of horns covered the rushing waters. One bold steer, preferring land to water, resolved on flight. The Mexicans at full speed, lasso in hand, pursued him. They returned, one had him by the horns, another by the tail—the lasso in both cases fastened to the horn of the saddle, and the well trained horses pulling as though they were in harness. When the chase began, I saw a young horse "pitch," as they call it out here. He threw his rider (who was an American,) and set off at freedom. A Mexican took after him, full speed, but his yards overtook, lassoed him, threw him down and held him fast till his fallen comrade came up, took a turn and remounted. The dexterity of these riders is astonishing. When a man from the old States expresses his astonishment, they laugh at his simplicity. The whole secret of their security seems to be in their fearlessness—and this is the result of habit. Neither man, woman, nor child is considered naturalized, until they can ride a "pitching horse, run down a mule-rabbit—rope a wild ox, drink hard water and call it good.

Texas is a curious country—a paradox. Everything is in the superlative, or contradictory, or nothing. It is the richest and the poorest—has the best land and the meanest water; is the hardest country to live in, and has the most to live on; the days are the hottest and the nights the coolest; here are the most rivers and the least water; the best roads, and the slowest travel; the finest building material, and the least use made of it; there are more clouds, and less rain; more timber and less timber; more ropes to tie horses, and yet more estrays; a poor country for farming, and yet the most productive; the least work and the largest yield; the horses are small and the cattle big; the frogs have tails, and the rabbits have ears like mules; the people are intelligent without general education—inventive without being tricky—refined without mannerism—rich without money—hospitable without houses—bold, generous and brave. In fine, here is an empire in extent and resources, but in the slowest process of evolution, and yet hastening to population, wealth and power. There is much to admire, but little to deplore; many things to eschew, but few to offend; and for the people and their institutions there is a splendid future.

THE POET-PREACHER. *

THE historical and biographical departments of our literature of Methodism, especially that part of it relating to early Methodism, are not in the present day so generally and searchingly read as they should be. No one is likely to have a correct understanding of Methodism or to be intelligently and firmly grounded in its principles, who neglects to become adequately acquainted with the historical and biographical literature of early Methodism. John Wesley's life has received more attention than that of Charles Wesley; still, the Life of Charles Wesley is yet to be written. The present volume, of nearly two hundred and fifty pages, has a beautiful appearance—is handsomely printed—and gives a brief, comprehensive, and striking view of the prominent points and events in the life and character of Charles Wesley. It is interesting, and its circulation and perusal cannot fail to do good. It is especially adopted to young people and Sunday Schools.

MINUTES OF MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

DR. MCTYEIRE says "every official member should have them." Certainly they ought. The valuable reports—the plan for lay co-operation, statistics etc., are invaluable to all who feel interested in our church—they are indispensable to every preacher and lay delegate who would understandingly attend our Conference business. All our most intelligent people want them. Natchez has ordered a second copy. Brethren, who have not sent in your orders—why will you remain behind and keep your people behind the age of intelligence, so easily procured? We hope not. Send on your orders and money too, if convenient. If not, we will do any other time.

H. J. HARRIS,
W. P. BARTON, } Committee.

ONLY ONE DOLLAR.

From the first of July to the first of January, last half of the present volume—the price of the Advocate will be one dollar. From the first of June to the end, be one dollar and fifteen cents. We shall have the numbers for all who wish to begin with the first of June, in order to attain all Bishop Pierce's Letters.

THE BALTIMORE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE'S New York correspondent, noticing the recent anniversary of the American Bible Society at New York, says: "A number of addresses were delivered. The Methodist Church was represented on the platform by the Rev. Dr. Clark of the Ladies Repository, and the Rev. Dr. Tyeiro of the Nashville Christian Advocate. They decidedly,—apart from all our preferences for Methodism—the best speeches of the occasion. They were impressive, powerful, evincing full knowledge of the subject and interest in the cause.

BISHOP PIERCE.—The Austin Intelligencer, 18th inst., says: Bishop Pierce arrived in the city, weary and travel-worn, and preached to a large congregation, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, on Wednesday night. On the next morning, accompanied by his wife and daughter, and several Methodist preachers, he started for San Antonio, to take the overland route for the distant shores of the Pacific.

SEND US RETURNS.—Our accounts, for large sums of money, have been sent out to our Agents. Send to every one of them, as soon as possible, settle them definitely, if possible, and send returns to the office. Small and large accounts should not be allowed. A Delinquent Agent scatters confusion in the Advocate office wherever he goes, all over the Conference. Settle up and send the money.

SUBSCRIBERS IN ARREARS will do us a favor, and themselves a justice, by sending us, carefully put up in a letter, at our risk, what they owe us, or by paying it to one of our Agents. If you do not know the amount, guess at it, and send it along. Be sure to send enough. Due credit will be given, and receipts acknowledged in the paper. Brethren and friends, let us have your remittements. Pay up! pay up now! Let us hear from you.

OUR LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS, which is being constantly, includes some of the best writers in the Union.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

JUNE 1, 1850.

OUR ADVERTISING COLUMNS are not to be compared, as to value, to secular papers with only a tenth of our circulation. Cheap, slow-paying, grumbling, non-paying advertisers had better go elsewhere. There are those who are beginning to find out the value of our columns.

OUR CIRCULATION is growing. Let every travelling and local preacher, every steward and class-leader, every member and every subscriber, help, and we shall reach ten thousand. But be quick—the year is passing away.

"GENEVRE BELLE" has a beautiful little story in the "Children's column," which has been overlooked for some time. We hope she will write again.

"MRS. SARAH HIDDEN ELLIS," departed, in memory of whom Rev. G. Capers has a little poem on our fourth page, was every way as beautiful in spirit as she is represented.

PERSONAL.

TENNYSON ON THE WAR.

THE British poet-laureate has hed his spirit stirred by the events now transpiring in Europe. Volunteer rifle corps are being formed in different districts—to pay their own expenses—and Tennyson has given inspiration to the movement by the following verses. The embody the old English Anti-Franch feeling, and is very unjuet to Napoleoe.

There is n sound of thueder afar,
Storm in the South thet darkens tha day,
Storm of battle aed thunder of war,
Well, if it do not roll our way.
Storm! storm! Riflemen form!
Ready, be ready to meet the storm!
Riflemae, riflemee, riflemen form!

Be not deaf to the sceod thet warns!
Be not gull'd by e desplot's plea!
Are figs of thistles, or grapes of thorns?
How should a despot set men frae?
Form! form! Riflemeo form?
Ready, be ready to meet the storm!
Riflemee, riflemee, riflemee form!

Let your Reforms for a moment go,
Look to your butts and take good aims;
Better a rotten borough or so.
Than a rotten fleet or a city in flnmes!
Form! form! Riflemen form!
Ready, be ready to meet the storm!
Riflemen, riflemee, riflemeo form!

Form—bo randy to do or dio!
Form, in freedom's name and the Queen's!
True, that we have a feithful elly,
But only the Devil knows what he means.
Form! Form! Riflemen form!
Itеady, be rendy to meet the storm!
Itiflemen, riflemen, riflemen form!

The United States mail steamship Tennessee, Capt. Forbes, from Vera Cruz the 23d inst., reached her wharf at an early hour last evening, with the regular semi-monthly Mexican meile.

The news is of importance. Santa Anea has been formally invited back into the country; his titles and honors and immense eotates restored to him by speciul decree; and an expedition sent to meet him on the see coast.

An expedition was also organizing at the capital, nnder the command of Cobos, one of the most notorious bandits of the republic, for an expedition of rapine and plunder to the Isthmus of Tehuantepec and other parts of the South.

TREATY OF RUSSIA WITH SARDINIA, NOT WITH FRANCE.—The correspondent of the Times says he has the strongest reasons for believing that the treaty which binds Russia to declare war against Austria within fifteen days after the invasion of Piedmont, was made with that State, and not with France, several months ago. At that time the Piedmontese Government had begun to be alarmed as to the effect of their attitude on the temper of Austria, and they were naturally unwilling to leave themselves wholly at the mercy of the Emperor of the French.

THE Turin correspondent of the London News, in his letter of the 5th:

There was a general report this morning that a skirmish had taken place at the advanced post at Cassolo, opposite to Abbiategrasso. It has been an encounter of light cavalry, in which rumor said the Austrians were four to one. A young Piedmontese officer, Capt. Colli, has drawn the first blood from the enemy by a sabre cut across the Austrian commanding officer's face. It was a sort of chivalrous encounter between those two, however, for both detachments retired.

LOCAL.

The Fire-Alarm and Police Telegraph is about to be introduced into this city. One of our dailies says that its history shows that it lessens the liability to loss by fire some seventy-five per cent; that it greatly decreases the risks of fire insurance and at the same time assures to underwriters a safer and more profitable business; that it diminishes the expense of the fire and police establishments, and induces a general feeling of confidence and security. A house may take fire in an inner room, and though no outward sign is apparent, as would be ordinarily necessary to announce the fire to a belfry watchman, within less than a minute after it is discovered by any person the strong voices of all the heaviest bells in the city may be tolling its whereabouts by signals which indicate within a hundred yards of where it is, a touch of the finger of the operator at the central station doing the work of a dozen or a hundred bell-ringers. Ruffians may be carrying it with a high hand and disregarding the weak force of the police in some distant district, and in an instant's time the call of aid is announced in the central station and assistance is on its way to aceee.

Square-block paving is going forward on the streets at an encouraging rate.

MONDAY EVINING, May 30, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, eodieg on the 28th inst.: The past week has been a period of very little ectivity in the market generally, and for most articles the prices have tended downward. In the early part of the week the Cotton market received some impulse through favurnble European advices, but still later and less favoreble accounts, received during the last day or two, have again checked operations and turned the advantage in favor of purchasers. Sugar and Molasses are both further depressed, as are also Breedstuffs and Provisioes, aed with an accumulating stock and but a limited demend at the moment, the Tobncco market tends in favor of purchasers.

Early on Thursday the regular weekly steamer Asie's advices from Liverpool, to the 14th inst. were received, corroborating the advance in the Liverpool Cotton market, reported by the City of Baltimore, but stating that subsequently id. of the advance was lost, the closieg quotations being 8¼d. for Fair Orleans and 6 13-16d. for Middling do. Tho sales for the entire week summed up 53,000 balee. The total stock ét Liverpool was stated at 542,000 beles—of which, 508,000 ere American. The advices from Maechester were unfnvorable, threadstuffs were firmer, and Provisions steedy but dull. There had been some fluctuations in Consols, but they closed at an improvement, beeg quoted at 92 for money.

The river is about two feet below high-water mark.

COTTON.—After great depressioo the market had rallied somewhet under the favorable Europenn advices brought by the steamer City of Baltimore, and which were before the public on Saturday morning. The sales of the first three days of the week summed up 12,500 hales, et an improvement of fully ¼c. per pound on the Middling grades. On Wednesday the market presented a very quiet nppearance, but few buyers comieg forward, the sales were confined to about 1500 bales. On Thursday, at an early nour, the Asia's advices were received, being from Liverpool to the 14th, which put a stop to business in our market, and barely 1100 beles were sold, in four or five lots, the greater part before receipt of the news. Friday also passed without any movemeet of conseqnence, only a few trifling lots being taken, barely amounting to 600 hales. The sales of the past three days sum up 3200 bales; making e total for the week of 15,700 bales. Total receipts of tha week 5724, and since the 1st September (exclusiva of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,641,725 bales, against 1,511,944 balen to same date last year. Tha total exports of the week amount to 39,609 bales; the stock ie presses aed on shipboard, not cleared on the 27th inst. 116,163 bales. With reepect to prices, wa giva quotations applicable to business in the early part of the week, remarking thet they have been rendered nominal by the Asia's advices.

BENSON'S COMMENTARY. We hava a snpply of this excellent standard work, in 5 vols., royal 8vo	14 00

[Mr. Benson has always been considered by the Methodists of Great-Britain as both learned and original; and as the most reliable in doctrine of all the American Commentators.

DUTIES OF MASTERS. By Rev. H. N. McTyeire, D. D. 50

[Methodist Preachers will, we doubt not, feel it to be a duty to place a copy of this work in the hands of every Southern Planter. It is by a Southern man—the only quarter from which we can consent to be exhorted on that subject. A long experience and acquaintance with both master and servant were prerequisites demanded as absolutely essential to quality one for writing at all, even but a little, upon this important theme. The writer has satisfied a want, felt by that large proportion of masters who wish to know what they ought to do, that they may do it and discharge their obligations to God and their servants. Not the least valuable part of the book is, that it contains four letters from Bishop Andrew on the religious instruction of Negroes.]

THE GOLDEN CENSER. By Dr. Summers 50

[This most excellent work is a corner stone for rearing the family altar. Good Christian wives, who have irreligious husbands, can, with the aid of this little book hold family prayers—until the father of the family comes to be, as he ought, the priest of his own house.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Sammie Walters.—A STORY FOR LITTLE BOYS.

"These boots are not half blacked, Sam; take them out this instant, sir, and never bring me such looking objects again. 'Wade' is very much deceived if he thinks you will boot-black the worth of your schooling." These words were addressed to a pale, thoughtful boy of ten years, by a haughty youth of twenty-one or two. Of course he was rich, and the little boy very poor.

Sammie was the son of a widow lady, known in her native village as Widow Walters. She was in straightened circumstances, but industrious and very honest. It was the darling desire of her heart to give her only child a good education; but how was she to accomplish it? There was an academy, but she could not afford to send him there, tuition was too high.

She and her son were talking over the subject one evening when, his whole face beaming with unusual intelligence, he exclaimed, "I know how I can go to school, Mother!" and seizing his hat, he darted out of the house, much to her surprise.

Mr. Wade, the principal of the academy spoken of, sat in his front room reading a newspaper when his little son brought in Sammie Walters.

"Papa, here is a little boy says he wants to come to school."

"Please, sir," said Sammie, "my mother is very poor, and I want to come to school; I'll work, sir, to pay for my schooling."

Mr. Wade smiled, and said "What can you do? You are too young to work."

"O yes, sir, I can;" replied little Sammie, and showed his sun-browned hand. "I can black shoes, bring water, and I'll do any thing for you, sir," and his little chin quivered; but, with a powerful struggle he controled his feelings, and awaited Mr. Wade's reply.

"Well, my little fellow, you may come to school next Monday."

"O, thank you, kind sir!" and he bounded from the room, to make glad his mother's heart with the joyful news.

* * * * * * * *

Three years have passed, and the skies are brightning. Sammie stands at the head of his class—what though he has to toil that he may study, his breast bounds as he thinks of the future—all bright and glorious. What a joy it is to his poor mother's widowed heart.

* * * * * * * *

Several years have passed, and he is a man. He walks forth into the world to carve his own fortune, for he has no rich aunt or uncle to leave him broad acres and overflowing coffers. He enters as clerk in a large store in a neighboring town. By his honesty and industry he gains the esteem of the whole establishment. By economy, he is soon enabled to set up a store of his own.

Reader, do you see that beautiful little cottage, embowered in honeysuckle and vines? THAT is the home of Samuel Walters. His mother shares it, and blesses God that she has such a son. He is not only respected but loved by every one. The once despised boot-black is now the rich merchant.

Reader, this is a picture—look abroad over the world, and see if you can find the original. GENEVRA BELLE.

Men who have Risen.

One of the best editors the Westminster Review could ever boast of, and one of the most brilliant writers of the day, was a cooper in Aberdeen. One of the editors of the London Daily Journal was a baker in Elgin; perhaps one of the best reporters of the London Times was a weaver in Edinburgh; the editor of the Witness was a stone-mason. One of the ablest ministers in London was a blacksmith in Dundee; another was a watchmaker in Banff. The late Dr. Milne, of China, was a herd-boy in Rhynie. The principal of the London Missionary Society's College, at Hong Kong, was a sadler in Huntley; and one of the best missionaries that ever went to India was a tailor in Keith. The leading machinist on the London and Birmingham Railway, with $3,500 a year, was a mechanic in Glasgow; and perhaps the very richest iron-founder in England was a working man in Moray. Sir James Clark, the queen's physician, was a druggist at Banff. Joseph Hume was a sailor first, and then a laborer at the mortar and pestle in Montrose; M'Gregor, the member of Parliament from Glasgow, was a poor boy in Rosshire; Wilson, the member from Westbury, was a plowman in Haddington; and Anderson, the member for Orkney, earned his bread by the sweat of his brow in the Ultima Thule. These men, however, spent their leisure hours in acquiring useful knowledge. American public life is full of such examples. With resolution, economy of time, perseverance, and an upright life, no young man need despair of success.

Elephant Bathing in India.

Beyond the dhoby, in cleaner water by comparison, a bevy of elephants are enjoying their morning bath. And they do enjoy it indeed! See how they roll away like so many porpoises, right under the flood, and leave the mahouts shouting and groping with their feet for the unstable black islands, which after a time rise up above the surface. Look at the great jets they blow up over their backs, and listen to the deep breath of pleasure or the shrill flourish of delight with which they lie down on the sand while their attendants knead them all over. These great creatures are so sagacious, so sensitive to kindness, that even in their wild state I cannot feel any sympathy with those who delight in killing them and call it "sport." But these elephants, fond as I am of them, are, it must be admitted, dangerous playmates.

In our camp there were no less than nine "koonies," or "murderers," beasts which have killed their mahouts or other attendants. One huge criminal, with a speckled forehead and proboscis, is guilty of the murder of no less than three unfortunate natives. The magnificent wild monster which belonged to Sir Hugh Wheeler, was carried off by the Nana, and was delivered up to us by the Rajah of Farruckabad, died a few days ago immediately after carrying some officers to church. He was a fine courageous creature, and his trunk and forehead bore marks of the claws of more than one tiger which had charged him and then been trampled to pulp by his ponderous feet. His "weakness" was fine French rolls, which he swallowed as an alderman would take Cockle's pills; and the twinkle of his eye as he gulped the loaf down and gave a gentle sigh out of his proboscis proclaimed the Sybarite.

I used to take great delectation in observing the creatures at the bath in the river which flows by our camp. They came down in flies, trumpeting gally in anticipation of the treat, and floundered into the water of the Gomtee, like so many portly Bruxellers enjoying the pas-coup san at Ostend. Each takes a long deep drink, putting his proboscis into the water, and then discharging the contents of it, when filled by suction, into his cavernous maw. Having thus filled up a wrinkle or two in his hide, he deposits himself boldly in the stream, so that one side lies out of the water and the tip of his proboscis is kept above the surface for the air. On this exposed island the mahouts labor diligently, washing the beast and rubbing him with hard brushes, cleaning his ears, kneading and shampooing him, while the pachyderm emits little squeaks of satisfaction. When one side is done the elephant turns on the other, and he is very angry indeed if he does not get his full share of manipulation.

[Correspondence of London Times.

During an Official Reception in Paris,

A provincial Bishop was noticed by a lady guest hastily leaving the ministerial saloon. "Monsigneur, why do you leave us so early?" "Ah, Madame, you put me out by the shoulders!" was the answer, alluding to her low-necked dress.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

At first I thought she was a nun, from her black dress and close cap. She was not introduced, and yet Edmund and I looked at each other at the same moment to whisper, "It is Miss Nightingale!" Yes, it was Florence Nightingale, greatest of all now in name and honor among women. I assure you that I was glad not to be obliged to speak just then, for I felt quite dumb as I looked at her wasted figure, and the short brown hair combed over her forehead like a child's, cut so when her life was despaired of from fever but a short time ago. Her dress, as I have said, was black, made high to the throat, its only ornament being a large enamaled broach which looked to me like the colors of a regiment surmounted with a wreath of laurel, no doubt some grateful offering from our men. To hide the close white cap a little, she had tied a white crape handkerchief over the back of it, only allowing the border of lace to be seen; and this gave a nun-like appearance, which first struck me on her entering the room, otherwise Miss Nightingale is by no means striking in appearance, only her plain black dress, quiet manner and great renown, told so powerfully altogether in that assembly of brilliant dresses and uniforms. She is very alight, and rather above the middle height; her face is long and thin, but this may be from recent illness and great fatigue. She has a very prominent nose, slightly Roman, and small dark eyes, kind, yet penetrating; but her face does not give you at all the idea of great talent. She looks a quiet, persevering, orderly, lady-like woman. I have done my best to give you a true pen-and-ink portrait of this celebrated lady. I suppose there is a hum all over the world of "What is she like?"—Sketches by Mrs. Hornby.

FASHIONABLE WOMEN.

Fashion kills more women than toil and sorrow. Obedience to fashion is a greater transgression of the laws of woman's nature, a greater injury to her physical and mental constitution than the hardships of poverty and neglect. The slave-woman at her tasks will live and grow old, and see two or three generation of her mistresses fade and pass away. The washerwoman, with scarce a ray of hope to cheer her in her toils, will live to see her fashionable sisters all die around her. The kitchen-maid is hearty and strong, when her lady has to be nursed like a sick baby. It is sad truth that fashion-pampered women are almost worthless for all the good ends of human life. They have but little force of character; they have still less power of moral will, and quite as little physical energy. They live for no great purpose in life; they accomplish no worthy ends. They are only dollforms in the hands of milliners and servants, to be dressed and fed to order. They dress nobody; they feed nobody; they instruct nobody; they bless nobody, and save nobody. They write no books; they set no rich examples of virtue and womanly life. If they rear children, servants and nurses do all, save to conceive and give them birth. And when reared, what are they? What do they ever amount to, but weaker scions of the old stock? Who ever heard of a fashionable woman's child exhibiting any virtue and power of mind for which it became eminent? Read the biographies of great and good men and women. Not one of them had a fashionable mother. They nearly all sprung from strong-minded women, who had about as little to do with fashion as with the changing clouds.

THE MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

The mother has most to do with all that awakens the young spirit in its early freshness, and makes that child that is to be "father to the man;" and she gives, perhaps, more of the impress of her whole being, physical and mental, to the original constitution and capacities of her offspring. Weak men, with superior wives, have had sons distinguished by very high intellectual ability; but the greatest men, with fools for their portion, have seldom been any thing but the fathers of fools. The great Lord Bacon was the representative of one that would have been memorable and illustrious, but for the gigantic and over-shadowing genius of his son. His Father, Sir Nicholas, was twice married; his first wife was a weak woman, and bore nothing but a mean and poor intellectual offspring; his second wife was distinguished and superior—a woman of capacity, of strong sense, mental culture and great energy; she was the mother of Bacon.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

AS A TRIBUTE TO DEPARTED WORTH AND A TOKEN OF undying affection these humble lines are inscribed to the MEMORY OF MRS. SARAH HIBBEN ELLIS: by her aged relative, G. CAPERS.

* * * * "Weep not for me,
For lo! I go where angels dwell,
In heaven's sweet, happy home."

"Weep not for me," methinks she cries,
I dwell in bliss divine;
We yet may meet beyond the skies,
For my sweet home is thine.

I've left my kindest, dearest friend;
God bade me from him flee.
Be calm, my love, He soon will send
To bring thee here to me.

My precious babe, thy mother's home
Will soon be thine, above;
In God's own bright and blissful dome
We'll dwell in endless love.

My mother, sisters, brother dear,
For me, oh! do not weep;
Let not a sigh nor bitter tear,
Disturb thy balmy sleep.

Thus would that dear and sainted one
Speak from her home above;
And bid us after glory run
To dwell with her in love.

But Jesus wept when Lazarus fled
To that bright world above;
Then we may weep—for oh! the dead
Claimed all our heart's best love.

Ah! yes, loved one, till we shall hear
That soft sweet voice of thine;
We'll pour affection's gushing tear.
O'er mem'ry's sacred shrine.

We loved thee for that heart of thine,
So pure, so chaste, discreet;
Where virtue's charms, with grace divine,
Did a'er so sweetly meet.

We loved thee for that lovely smile
Which told thy inborn grace;
That grace which frees the heart from guile
And sweetly decked thy face.

We loved thee, for we ne'er can tell
Of virtues such as thine;
They clustered in thy heart to dwell,
In glory now they shine.

'Twas thine to seek, and thine to bless
The needy and the poor;
Thy tears in hours of sad distress
Were shed at pity's door.

There like an angel from the sky
With balmy sweet solace;
You wiped the tear from sorrow's eye
With sweet angelic grace.

But thou art gone, far, far away,
To dwell in bliss divine;
And left us here to strive and pray
To share that bliss of thine.

We'll try to meet thee there ere long
In thy celestial home;
And sing with thee Redemption's song,
Look out—we soon may come.

And there amid the angel throng
We'll strike the golden string,
To that dear sweet redeeming song
Which angels cannot sing.

Tell then adieu! thou sainted one,
Rest in thy bright abode;
With seraphs task around the Throne
Of thy immortal God.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

RICHARD FEATHERSTONE was born in Nottoway county, Virginia, 7th November, 1791, but resided for the last thirty-six years in Warren county, Mississippi, where he died 18th April, 1859. He was married 12th December, 1815, to Frances M. Sills, who survives, to suffer the more from her bereavement as their union had been so long and happy. A cripple from rheumatism (of which he died) for fifty years, he was yet a man of more than ordinary activity and enterprize. With his pony, sometimes with his crutches, he could hunt, survey, or superintend his farm, as well as the most active; and, he was always sanguine and cheerful. He devoted the greater part of his life to teaching, and was very successful. He was converted among the Methodists at Mayes' Chapel, near the place of his birth, 1st September, 1810, and was ever after a working member of the church. Few, out of the ministry, have been the instrument of so many conversions, or otherwise accomplished as much good in the church. At camp-meetings he was foremost—gifted with prayer and exhortation—efficient as a class-leader; and, when circumstances favored, he was the originator and head of some Sabbath-school. He possessed one qualification, rare, but essential in a prominent member of a church; he would counsel according to truth and conviction, or warn, to an extent disagreeable at the time, however approved subsequently. He would tell his brother of his faults, and it could not be that he did not occasionally displease some. He outlived it all, and perhaps had no enemy when he died. A life of piety and usefulness always brings an end of peace. His was eminently so. He lingered long and suffered greatly, but without a murmur; on the contrary, his was a spirit of constant rejoicing. He had been a student, and was well read in our standard works, and his expressions were such as a clear mind full of faith and hope would be expected to utter. He had no doubt of his acceptance with God, through faith in the atoning blood, and often would he sing and praise, and repeat the promises of Scripture, as they abound in the Word of God. E. G. C.

HESTER C. WOOD, wife of Rev. D. S. Wood, died, April 26th, 1859, in Choctaw county, Alabama, in her 57th year. Sister Wood joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1827, as a seeker of religion; and in November of the same year at a Camp-meeting in Green county, North Carolina, while partaking of the Sacrament of the Lord's supper found the Savior precious to her soul. For thirty-two years she lived a faithful member of the Church. Her meek and gentle spirit has left a deep imprint upon all who were blessed with her acquaintance, and especially upon her own family. She was a good wife, a good mother and a good neighbor. For twenty years past she was the subject of deep afflictions. The last few months her bodily pains were almost intolerable. But while the Lord thus afflicted with one hand he blessed with the other. I found her in the fullest enjoyment of religion. I never saw a more complete triumph of the faith of the Christian over the severest afflictions. In describing the blessing she had just received, said she, "I felt no pain then, the spirit triumphed over the body." She often expressed perfect resignation to the will of God. On the day of her death she said: "I once thought I never would see the time when I would wish to die; but it has come now; my husband is sick and I cant wait on him; I am sick, and he cant wait on me. If all my children were here, I feel like I could fly away." That night about 11 o'clock, without a struggle or a groan, she breathed her last. An aged husband and seven children are left to mourn. All the children are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. G. HAWKINS.

MRS. MARY JANE SADDLER died in her twenty-fifth year, at the residence of her husband, near Alexandria, Rapides parish, Louisiana, on the 13th May, 1859. She was born December 5, 1834; professed religion in 1851, at a camp-meeting held in this parish; was married to Mr. W. H. Seddler, 10th of August, 1853; lived a strictly Christian life. She was a kind and dutiful wife, an affectionate mother, and one whom her servants loved. In her death the church has lost one of its brightest ornaments. But she has only left her seat below to occupy one above. She leaves a husband, three little children, and a large circle of relatives and friends. But they mourn not as those having no hope. R.

MRS. SARAH POWERS died at Baton Rouge on 22d inst., in her 62d year, full of faith and hope in a blissful immortality. She was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church in this place twenty-five or thirty years. She was always at her seat in Church, and ready to do good. I said "Jesus can make a dying bed feel soft as downy pillows are." "Yes," said she, "I know that; I realize that he has made mine!" She then called her children around her, gave instructions about her affairs, and made them promise to meet her in Heaven. Then said "I am now ready to die." And soon after fell asleep in Jesus. H. A.

BROTHER ALEXANDER G. STRINGER departed this life May 11th, 1859, after an illness of about seven weeks. He suffered much, but bore his afflictions with patience and Christian resignation. He expressed a willingness to depart and be with Christ. We have lost a good member; his children an affectionate father. But our loss is his eternal gain.

On arriving at Selma, patrons will find hacks or omnibuses to convey them, without delay, to Summerfield, a distance of only eight miles.

The healthfulness and good society of Summerfield, are proverbial, only four deaths having occurred in it since it was established.

The Male School, under the very able and distinguished educator, Rev. D. C. B. CONNERLY, is alike prosperous. No institution in the South or North can offer facilities superior to those possessed by the Centenary Institute. By the large additions which have been made to the buildings within the last year, accommodations are now furnished for one hundred and twenty boarders in the Female College.

The President and family, together with all the female teachers, board in the College, and have the special oversight of all the pupils.

One half of the charges are payable in advance, and the remainder by the first of March.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story—one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and fur care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 16 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indispositine proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children; I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.
On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount prescribed. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running on as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.
Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.
These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my unlimited confidence in nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observations.
W. H. VASSER.

A SKETCH OF CHARLES WESLEY.

On the 29th of March, 1788, another great light of Methodism went out, or rather sunk below the horizon, still throwing its rays high upon the sky, and brightening the prospect of even our times.

Charles Wesley had not his brother's legislative talent. His poetic nature suffered the melancholy, the morbid discontent usual to such genius. Had the leadership of Methodism early devolved upon him by the death of his brother, as was at one time likely, it would probably have been either extinct to-day or hardly distinguishable as a special religious agency in the world. He opposed nearly every great measure of his brother which has contributed to its organic power and permanence. His character as a poet has already been repeatedly alluded to, and will hereafter be more fully considered. As a preacher he was more eloquent than his brother. He continued to labor till the last in Wesley's London and Bristol chapels, and when the infirmities of age rendered him unable to proceed through an entire sermon, he still clung to the pulpit, calling upon his congregation to sing while he rested, through brief intermissions. In the last year of his life he maintained the Methodistic habit of ministering to the condemned of the prisons, as he had done at first in Oxford, visiting them in their cells and presenting their cases to his congregations for public prayers. The last of his poetical publications, issued but three years before his death, was a small tract, of "Prayers for condemned Malefactors." In a manuscript note to the pamphlet he wrote: "These prayers were answered, Thursday, April 28, 1785, on nineteen malefactors, who all died penitent. Not unto me, O Lord! not unto me!"

The Castalian fount seemed to be opened in his very heart, and flowed on undried by age. Clothed in the midst of summer with his winter dress, says one of his London associates, he rode daily a small horse, gray with age, but which was often a Pegasus to him. When he mounted, if a subject for verse struck him he would expand it as he rode, and pencil it in short hand on a card which was always carried for the purpose. Often, when he returned to the City Road parsonage, did he leave his poney in the garden, and enter crying out: "Pen and ink! pen and ink!" Supplied with these he would finish the composition before recognizing or saluting any one who might be present. But when the inspired task was done, no man could be more courteous. After the kindest salutations and inquiries, he usually "gave out a short hymn, and thus put all in mind of eternity."

His last sickness was long, but borne with "unshaken confidence in Christ, which kept his mind in perfect peace." He called his wife to his bedside, and requesting her to take a pen, he dictated his last but sublime poetical utterance;

> "In age and feebleness extreme,
> Who shall a sinful worm redeem?
> Jesus, my only hope thou art;
> Strength of my failing flesh and heart;
> O could I catch a smile from thee,
> And drop into eternity!"

"For fifty years," says his biographer, "Christ, as the Redeemer of men, had been the subject of his effective ministry, and of his loftiest songs, and he may be said to have died with a hymn to Christ upon his lips." He was in the eightieth year of his age; his heart retained the warmth of youth, and his ecclesiastical prejudices were unchanged. He refused to be buried in his brother's tomb, among the now illustrious dead of City Road Chapel, because it was not "consecrated ground." Methodism owes so much to him, that it can well excuse the honest eccentricities of his genius. He was the first member of the "Holy Club" at Oxford; the first to receive the name of Methodist; the first of the two brothers who experienced regeneration; and the first to administer the sacraments in Methodist societies apart from the Church. Like his brother, he was short in stature; and when they both, assisted by Dr. Coke, administered the Eucharist at City Road Chapel, it was matter of remark that the three men who were exerting the largest religious influence of their day were so small in person, and so great in spirit. Charles Wesley was desultory in his habits, being exact only in the neatness of his handwriting and in keeping his accounts; he was abrupt in his manners, but without affectation; he was contradictory, but tenacious in his opinions; a staunch Churchman, but the first, and for many years the chief man to conduct Methodist worship in Church hours, which he did to the last in the London Chapels. He detested democracy, and satirized Fox and Burke alike with Wilkes and the lowest of liberal demagogues. He was a thorough scholar in classical and Biblical literature. Horace and Virgil were his most familiar classics; the Æneid he had largely in his memory, and would quote it volubly, as a check to his resentment, when under provocation. The termagant wife of John Wesley once shut him and his brother in a room beyond escape, and poured forth her complaints against them in a strain which could not be interrupted; the poet invoked the help of his Mantuan brother, and repeated the classic Latin so vehemently as to subdue the shrew and obtain his liberation. His friendships were ardent and inviolable. An air of sadness, deepening often into melancholy, hung about him. He was the best hymnist, one of the best preachers, and, with a few pardonable weaknesses, one of the best men of his age. Hundreds of thousands of dying Methodists have blessed his memory, as they have sung or gasped the lyrics in which he has taught them to exult over death. REV. NATHAN BANGS, D.D.

BY REV. DR. JOHN M'CLINTOCK.

No name is more fully identified with the history of American Methodism for the last sixty years than that of Nathan Bangs. His biography, when it comes to be fully written, will be to a large extent, a history of the Church.

Nathan Bangs was born May 2, 1778, near Bridgeport, Connecticut. When he was about thirteen years of age the family moved to Stamford, Delaware county, New York, and here, on the home farm, the boy grew up. Endowed with great natural acuteness and force of mind, he profitted so well by the common school education of the time that at eighteen he was capable of teaching such a school himself. At twenty one he removed to Upper Canada, where he was employed for three years as surveyor and teacher. In 1800 he was awakened and converted under the preaching of the Rev. Joseph Sawyer, who died at a great age, in the odor of sanctity, some few years since. Very soon after his conversion, the young surveyor felt the call to preach the Gospel among the Methodists, through whose instrumentality he had been brought to God. He began to preach under the presiding elder in 1801, and in 1802 was admittted to the New York Conference, which then embraced Canada. In the next six years he labored in Canada, in Niagara circuit, Bay of Quinte, Montreal, and Quebec. His first year was one of great trial. He preached with all the ardor of a youthful evangelist, full of fire and vigor, but souls were not converted. Temptation came; his heart und courage failed; and he was disposed to quit his work and go home. One night after a weary day of fruitless labor, he slept heavily and dreamed. He was working with a pick-ax on the top of a basaltic rock. His muscular arm brought down stroke after stroke for hours; but after all the rock was hardly indented. He said to himself at last, "It is useless; I will pick no more." Suddenly a stranger of dignified mien stood by his side and spoke to him. "You will pick no more?" "No." "Were you not set to this task?" "Yes." "And why abandon it?" "My work is vain; I make no impression on the rock." Solemnly the stranger replied, "What is that to you? Your duty is to pick, whether the rock yields or not. Your work is in your own hands; the result is not. Go on!" He resumed his task. The first blow was given with almost superhuman force, and the rock flew into a thousand pieces. He awoke; went to work with fresh zeal and energy, and a great revival followed. From that day to this he has never had even a "temptation" to give up his commission.

These years of service in Canada were full of incident. The toils and privations of frontier life were hightoned by the severity of the climate; a winter in the Canadian forests is a very different thing from a winter in the woods of Virginia or Kentucky. The young evangelist went from village to village, often through pathless wastes and virgin forests, guided only by the "blaze" of the wood-cutter or the "marks" of the huntsman. In 1804 Bishop Asbury sent him, at his own request, as Missionary to the River Thames region, then just opening to pioneer settlement.

By 1808, Mr. Bangs, as a travelling elder, attended the General Conference held in New York. He has sat in every General Conference from that date to the present, except those of 1848 and 1856. In 1810 he was first appointed to the city of New York, then a circuit with five preaching-places. The population of the city was less than 100,000. He has seen it grow till, with its suburbs, it numbers a million of souls, with perhaps one hundred and fifty Methodist preachers.

The General Conference of 1812 appointed a committee, of which Mr. Bangs was chairman, to gather materials for a history of the Methodist Episcopal Church. No great fruit came of the commission; but it had the happy effect of giving a bent to the mind of the chairman, which finally resulted in his "History," of which we shall speak by and by. Before this time he had become known as a writer by an essay against "Christinnism in 1809," and from this time on, his pen was never idle. A more industrious writer, or one whose productions have been more useful in the development and defence of American Methodism, the Church has never had.

In 1813 he was appointed presiding elder of Rhinebeck district. In its vast territory, now covered by six districts, there were but three or four small churches, and not a single parsonage. During his four years service many churches were built; and at this day there is a church in every village, and a parsonage attached to almost every church. From 1817 to 1820 he served again in New York city, and also in New York district; and to this same field of labor he returned again in 1842, occupying it till his superannuation in 1852. With the exception of a single year's service as President of the Wesleyan University—1841-42—he has now lived forty-two years in New York and Brooklyn. No figure is better known in the streets of the great city than his; no name stands in higher repute. His unspotted life, his simplicity of character, his earnest devotion to goodness and truth, and his no less earnest hatred of wrong, have gained him the love and esteem of all denominations of Christians in New York; while his intellectual force and energy have left their mark upon the moral condition of the city.

When Dr. Bangs was made Book Agent in 1820, the entire business was carried on in a small store in John street. The Concern was deeply in debt, and yet its scale of operations was very small. The new Agent went to work with his accustomed promptitude and energy. He boldly resolved "to increase the debt" in order to pay it. New and costly works, such as Benson's Commentary, etc., were undertaken; a system of exchanges with other publishers was arranged; old stock was sold off at low prices; and new life was given to the movement of the business in all its branches. A bindery was added in 1822, and a printing-office in 1824. In that year, too, the premises of the old Wesleyan Seminary, in Crosby street, were purchased and fitted up for the uses of the Concern at large expense. In 1824 Dr. Emory was associated with Dr. Bangs, and zealously seconded the energetic movements of the principal Agent.

The same spirit of enterprise led to the publication of the "Christian Advocate," which appeared for the first time on the 8th of September, 1826. The paper was at first nominally edited by B. Badger, but the editorial matter from 1826 to 1828 was chiefly furnished by Dr. Bangs, though he was still discharging the arduous duties of senior Book Agent. During the whole period of his agency—1820-28—he was also editor of the Methodist Magazine.

In 1828 he was appointed editor of the "Advocate." In 1829 he published his "Life of the Rev. Freeborn Garrettson. In 1832 appeared the "Authentic History of the Missions under the care of the Methodist Episcopal Church." In 1830 the Agent resolved to change the Monthly Magazine to a Quarterly. The change was approved by the General Conference of 1832, and Dr. Bangs was chosen "editor of the Quarterly Review and of the books of the General Catalogue." During these four years, also, Dr. Bangs edited a number of books for the General Catalogue, and also contributed largely to the "Christian Advocate and Journal."

In 1836 the General Conference found it necessary to elect a "Missionary Secretary," and the eyes of the Church turned at once to Dr. Bangs. It was not till 1838 that the first volume of the "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church" was published. The remaining three volumes followed rapidly, the last appearing in 1841.

The years of Dr. Bangs' superannuation—since 1852—have been anything but idle. Besides numerous contributions to the various periodicals of the Church, he has published several books during that time. In these latter writings of Dr. Bangs, there is no diminution of vigor in style, or of independence in thought. He shows in his writings, as in his personal tone of life and conversation, a remarkable freshness of feeling. At eighty-one he is still ardent in feeling, quick in sympathy and resolute in courage. Convinced from the Ladies' Repository.

THE GREAT CHINESE REBELLION.

This wonder of the age, as to its religious element, is very ably reviewed in the London Times. The insurrection which threatens either to overrun or dismember China, originated in a few Chinese who had become strongly impressed by reading the Holy Scriptures, and tracts published by Protestants. At first they were persecuted, and retired to the hilly districts near Canton, where they met for prayer to "the heavenly Futher," in the name of Jesus. Their very imperfect knowledge of Christianity soon turned their religious feelings into fanaticism, and from retiring before their persecutors they sallied forth and attacked their enemies. They fully admitted the atonement, the divine mission of Christ, and the sin of idolatry. But they adopted polygamy, and like the Mohammedans held that a war-spirit was necessary to put down idolatry.

Ta-ping-wang, the leading insurgent, considered himself divinely inspired, and called to take the imperial control of China. He has long been at the head of an army who have reverenced him as a divinely commissioned and heaven-honored head of a new dynasty, and now he has become irreclaimably established, like a second Mahomet, in his fanaticism. His followers are baptised in the name of the Trinity, and call themselves Christians, and multitudes from the conquered cities and provinces have become his followers.

One of the disciples of Ta-ping-wang related, that they have the Lord's Supper every month, and not upon the Sabbath day. At this ceremony they use wine made from grapes—a curious circumstance, grape wine never being used in China—showing the anxiety of these Christians to maintain as exactly as they know how, the creed and practice of Christianity. They admit new applicants to baptism after not more than a day's instruction. Twenty-four elders or chang-lous have assigned to them the office of preaching. There are also priests who superintend the sacrifices. The practice of offering sacrifices they have unquestionably adopted from reading the Old Testament without guidance as to what parts of it are, and what are not, intended for imitation by Christians. He told us that he met several men who had been baptized by Dr. Gutziaff, holding posts of influence in the Ta-ping official staff. He denied, when asked, that he smoked opium, saying that it was forbidden strictly in the regulations of Ta-ping-wang. When the question was repeated, he replied, "How could I tell a lie, who am a discipline of Jesus?"

THE BRITISH WESLEYANS.

The Wesleyan Missionary Society, with an income this year of about £130,000, and more than four hundred ordained missionaries, with double the number of school teachers and catechists, is now the most potent organization of the kind in Christendom. The anniversary this this year must bring with it urgent claims and powerful attractions. There are to be twenty-three preparatory sermons, a breakfast meeting, and the monster meeting at Exeter Hall. The leading ministers engaged are President Bowers, Dr. Ruffles, the Revs. T. A. West, H. Gregory, J. Rattenbury, W. M. Punshon, A. Ward, Thos. Vasey, J. Lomas, L. H. Wiseman, and R. Roberts.

For several years the Wesleyan Missionary Society, by listening to the piteous calls from abroad, had gone beyond its means, and become involved in debt. But now it is gratifying to know that the debt no longer exists, the expenditure of the year has been met by the receipts, and provision has also been made for the outfit and passage of another ten additional missionaries, whom the committee hope to send this year to India.

The next Conference will be held this year in Manchester, and already vaticinations are indulged regarding the probable occupant of the Presidential chair. Until within the last few weeks, the conviction was all but universal among our ministers, that the Rev. S. D. Waddy, President of Wesley College, Sheffield, would be the President of 1859; but latterly a strong party has put prominently forward the claims of Dr. J. Hannah, for the highest honor which the British Conference has to bestow. Dr. Hannah has been twice before our President; this year the interval required by Methodist law of eight years expires, when a re-election to the chair may take place; and from the fact that Dr. Clarke was three times President, and Drs. Bunting and Newton four times, Dr. Hannah's friends allege that he is as worthy of the thrice-repeated distinction as any who have ever had it, and that this is the year for its bestowment. A few votes may be given to the Rev. Thos. Jackson and the Rev. P. M'Owan, if not to the Rev. Wm. Arthur, but the close competition will doubtless be between Dr. Hannah and Mr. Waddy.

As Conference draws nigh, much interest and anxiety are felt as to the new appointments of the preachers. Our custom is for circuits to invite preachers from their March Quarterly Meeting, and if the invited preachers accept, the Conference, as a rule, makes the appointment accordingly. Of course by this system, it is found that the worst preachers are without invitations, and the worst circuits have not been able to prevail on any preachers to promise to go them; and the main difficulty of the appointing power is to deal with these cases.—Correspondence Zion's Herald.

THE EUROPEAN LEADERS.

Louis Napoleon, the Emperor of the French, was fifty-one years old on the 20th of April, last. After an adventurous youth and early manhood, he was elected representative in the National Assembly in 1848, from which post he was soon raised to the Presidency, and thence raised himself to imperial power. He was formerly accounted hair-brained and flighty, but as Emperor has shown himself fully equal, yea superior, to his renowned uncle, as a statesman, and lacks only the same military success to be equal to him in every respect. He is today the most powerful statesman in Europe. He has been soundly abused by almost every body for almost every thing he has done. But it would be difficult to show that he could have done better, under the circumstances.

Victor Emmanuel, King of Sardinia, was born March 14, 1820. He acceded to the throne in 1849, on his father's abdication, after being defeated by the Austrians. His reign has been eminently successful. His action during the Crimean war, in joining the Sardinian forces to the allies against Russia, and securing for Sardinia a voice in the Congress of Paris, and to settle the questions in dispute, placed Sardinia ahead of all the other Italian States, while his support of the liberal cause in Italy has won him the sympathies of the people. He comes of a race older even than the Bourbons, though, like other old properties, it has been a good deal knocked about in its journey down the Vale of Time. Deep in the dark ages his ancestors were Counts of Savoy, and waged fierce wars with adjacent barons as the custom of those days was.

As a monarch he is well spoken of by political writers. He is stained by none of the personal vices which so frequently render monarchy contemptible. His public policy has raised Sardinia to a very high rank among European States. Her credit stands high; her people are happy and prosperous; her trade is increasing; liberty of speech and of the press prevail within her borders; the power of the Romish Church has been curtailed. And he is to-day the champion of freedom and religious toleration in Catholic Europe.

Francis Joseph, Emperor of Austria, was born in August, 1830, and is consequently but nearly twenty-nine years of age. He is a son of the Archduke Francis Joseph. He was declared a major December, 1848, and succeeded his uncle, Ferdinand I., who abdicated December 2, 1848, through the renunciation by his father, of the succession. He has shown more administrative ability than he was supposed to possess—although it is said that much of his success is owing to his mother, the Archduchess Sophia. His personal participation in the war attracts much interest.

He has never come before the public except in connection with graceful acts. We have heard of his marriage to a sweet and amiable girl, Amelia of Bavaria; of his fondness for his children; of his distress when his little daughter died; of the acts of personal kindness by which he strove to win back the Hungarians to loyalty. This is about all that has been made public in connection with his name. He is now said to be animated by the most violent desire for war, and will perhaps take the field in person.

Count Camile de Cavour, Prime Minister of Sardinia, is thought to have nearly as much to do with bringing on the present crisis as any other man except the French Emperor. He was born at Turin, of an ancient and wealthy, but not noble family, on the 10th of August, 1820, and is now in his 40th year. In 1847 he had already made himself a political notability in Piedmont by becoming editor of the Risorgimento, a journal of daringly liberal tendencies, yet pervaded by the aristocratic spirit as regarded the tone of its articles. He assisted at the very birth of the Piedmontese Parliamentary system. In 1840 he went into Parliament; in 1850 he was called to the Cabinet; and in 1853 he became Prime Minister, continuing such without a rival in influence to the present day.

THE BRITISH PANIC ABOUT FRANCE.

The great British public and their chosen organ, the London Times, are visited by periodical panics in reference to the designs of the French. It is a fixed idea in the British mind that the French nation and their ruler, the Emperor Napoleon, are aiming at the conquest or humiliation of England. No matter how utterly at variance such a policy may be with the interests of France, and no matter how completely it is contradicted by the words and deeds of the French Government, John Bull—like the nun in the old tale—insists on being outraged, and will not be pacified.

The delusion is no new thing. It is now obvious to all unbiased readers of history that if there was one object above all others on which the older Napoleon had set his heart, it was an alliance with Great Britain. He never attained that object, mainly because the English were so stubbornly set on disbelieving his word, mistrusting his promises, and misinterpreting his acts, that, say or do what he might to conciliate them, he always found them his implacable enemies and his wanton traducers. They were honest in their hate. They could not be convinced but that he sought the conquest of their island. It was a monstrous delusion, as we all know. But all England shared it; and even to this date it is part and parcel of the patriotic creed of nine out of every ten Englishmen.

Very few readers of the papers have forgotten the awful predictions of the Times at the time Louis Napoleon became Emperor. Even Junius—that prince of polished scurrility—appears moderate and forbearing when contrasted with the attacks on Napoleon which were published daily in the London papers six and seven years ago. Every species of calumny and insult that ingenuity could invent or genius barb were leveled at this single man for week after week, and month after month, and year after year. He could not make a speech without being pronounced a liar, a cheat, and a scoundrel. He could not put down a red republican riot without being told that he was a murderer of the blackest dye. When he married, the most respectable London journals calmly proceeded to vilify his own and his wife's private character, with an infamous recklessness of truth and decency which they dared not have used in speaking of any British subject, however humble. And all this while, to keep the British temper at quarreling pitch, England was daily assured that a thousand indications made it certain that Napoleon was planning a descent on Great Britain.

All this Napoleon requited, first, by resolute calmness, next, by engaging in an offensive and defensive alliance with Great Britain, and by going to war with Russia to prevent her interfering with the British overland route to India. It might have been supposed that this would have silenced the hate and spite of even the Times. But it did not; on the contrary, they grew more intense. Though the French had no contemporaneous accounts of the war in their newspapers, and thus the field of bragging was exclusively abandoned to their allies; though even the British correspondents admitted that the English were too late at the Alma, would have been overwhelmed at Inkerman owing to their old blunders but for Bosquet and the French, and delayed the fall of Sebastopol several weeks by failing to take the Redan; though the French management of their troops was as skilful and soldierly as that of the English was clumsy and disgraceful; and though, in the face of all these shortcomings of the English, not one word of reproach or complaint, not one sneer even appeared in a French print, yet the British writers, during and after the war, constantly and studiously endeavored to make it appear that the British had been cheated by their allies; that the disgraces—which proceeded from their own errors and bad generalship—were the fruit of French tricks; and that Napoleon, who threw away, 500,000,000 francs and 100,000 men to fight England's battle, was not her sincere ally. Even when there was actually nothing more to fight for, the English persisted in asserting that the treaty of Paris was forced on the English by Napoleon, who betrayed them for the friendship of Russia.

Next came the affair of the colonels. An attempt of an atrocious nature had been made to murder the Emperor, and had nearly proved successful. The assassins had lived in England, met and conspired in England. The instruments of death had been manufactured in England; and shipped from England. The money which sustained the murderers had been raised in England. The real heads of the conspiracy, the men who would have reaped the profit had the bombs done their work, were the guests of the English people, the proteges of the leaders of English politics, valued contributors to the English press. When the attempt was made there was no outcry in England. People were shocked, but there was no indignation. On the contrary, when a fellow who had at least connived at the atrocious crime, if, indeed, he was not an active accomplice, was arrested and tried, British sentiment took his part openly, overawed court and jury, and made a hero of him when he was acquitted. Was it surprising under the circumstances that the French colonels should express a pretty lively indignation at such conduct on the part of a friendly people? If the case had been reversed, and the assassins had attempted the life of Queen Victoria, and the Paris mob had gloried them and overawed the court where they were tried, would the British soldiers have been mealy-mouthed in their addresses? We think they would have used language far stronger than that of the colonels. Yet on the first outburst of anger on the part of the latter the English set up their howl about a French invasion, the London Times called for more coast defences, and Mr. Sampson, the London correspondent of our New York Commercial Advertiser, actually fixed the time of the French declaration of war against Great Britain at sixty days from the day on which he wrote to our venerable contemporary.

Well, this fright blew over like the others, and though the English were deeply grieved that the French should dare to improve the port of Cherbourg; though the British heart was lacerated by the affront put upon the Queen by the Emperor in inviting her to come and see how he had made a safe harbor where was none before; John Bull after a time allowed himself to be calmed. To be sure, Mr. Roebuck, not a bad type of his countrymen in some respects, did come back from France where he had been most hospitably feasted, and wined, and promenaded, and abused the Emperor roundly. But the public generally were quiet.

Now, the old disease has broken out afresh. France has determined to settle the Italian question once for all, and to stop up that spring of incessant discord. To do so the more effectually she has made a convention with Russia to the effect that the war shall be confined to Italy, and that Russia shall do her best to see fair play between France and Austria. Some word of this convention reaching England, the Times and the British public again splutter with rage. In their blind fury they make out that the convention is a treaty offensive and defensive, that Russia has handed over her fleet to the Emperor to be used against England, and that Denmark has presented the Emperor with her half dozen ships for the same purpose. All this the Times asserts unequivocally, the stock exchange believes, at a cost of 52 members, and poor Mr. Sampson once more pours forth the vials of his wrath on Napoleon in the columns of our respected contemporary.

It is in vain that one by one the facts are disproved. Denmark shows that she has made no such alliance; no matter. The Russian Embassador officially states that his master contemplates no design hostile to Great Britain; he is not listened to. Common sense points out the utter absurdity of such a combination as British terror has conjured up; it is all of no avail. The English must have their bugbear. They will be outraged, and there's no use trying to soothe them. Like Moliere's Imaginary Invalid, they are ready to knock any man down who is skeptical about their dreadful sufferings.

A few weeks hence the furor will subside, and the French Invasion will again be postponed. But the play is too popular to be withdrawn permanently from the bills. It will be reproduced from time to time, to the grim satisfaction of the British, for many a year to come—until, indeed, the Englishmen of the Roebuck and Sampson type be wholly defunct.—Harper's Weekly.

"FORGIVENESS."

Mr. Editor—I see that Rev. J. J. Lacy, in the Advocate of the 11th inst., takes you resolutely to task for saying, in your issue of 15th Dec.: "that we ought to bestow forgiveness on an offender, whether he desires it or not." You affirm an unconditional forgiveness in matters of personal offence—Mr. Lacy affirms a conditional forgiveness. The full statement of his theory may be made in one of his proof texts. "If he repent, forgive him." Who is right?—that is the question. I have not had definite opinions on this subject so long as sixteen years. But ever since I have had any opinion at all, I have thought that the position assumed by Mr. Lacy is wrong and unscriptural. I see nothing in his article that induces me to change my opinion.

Mr. L. has but two proof texts. Let us examine them. "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." Mr. L. makes "as," equivalent to "on the same terms," which being substituted for "as," would make the passage read, "Forgive us our debts on the same terms that we forgive our debtors." Suppose we admit this rendering; does it even then teach that because God requires us to repent before he forgives us, that we ought therefore to require offenders against us to repent before we forgive them? Certainly not. Instead of affirming that the rule or principle by which God bestows forgiveness is to be that by which we should bestow it: it is only a prayer that the principle of forgiveness, by which we are governed towards offenders against us, may be the principle by which God will extend forgiveness to us; or briefly, instead of saying that God's rule shall be ours, it prays that our rule may be His. This is the state of the case, admitting Mr. Lacy's reading of the text; but it is questionable if that reading be right. I think if Mr. Lacy will compare Matt. vi. 12, with Luke xi. 4, he will get some new light on this subject. Matthew says, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." Luke says, "Forgive us our sins; for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us." Now if we admit Mr. Lacy's rendering of the word "as" to be correct, we unavoidably bring Matthew and Luke into conflict in their report of our Lord's prayer; and it would be impossible to reconcile them. But make the word "for" in Luke, equivalent to "because," or "for the reason that"—making it read "Forgive us our sins; because, or for the reason, that we also forgive every one that is indebted to us;" and there is no conflict between the two Evangelists—the word as being often used in the sense of for. If this be the proper reading, what becomes of Mr. L.'s theory of forgiveness? This text, at all events, renders it no aid.

In this connection it may be proper to add, that the relations existing between man and man are so vastly different from the relations existing between God and man; and the purposes for which man's forgiveness is bestowed are so different from those for which God's is bestowed, that there can be no perfect and entire unity in the principles that govern both. Our law of duty is not to be found in what God does, but in that which he directs us to do. It may be incompetent for God to forgive without repentence, and, at the same time, competent for us to do so. So far then it only appears that Mr. Lacy, at the altar, sixteen years ago, was taught that unless he repented, God would not forgive him. A most wholesome gospel truth—essential to be taught at every altar. We imagine that a discussion of the abstract principle of human forgiveness at an altar, where mourners were seeking religion would have been dry work for Methodists sixteen years ago. It was at all events a very long running start for Mr. Lacy to take upon the study of divinity. With such a start he ought to be a Doctor of Divinity in sixteen years. I began the week after I was converted, and some certain very shrewd persons thought that I was fully up to the Young America music. (If Mr. L. is a D. D. I beg his forgiveness and, to meet the demands of his theory, I repent now.)

Another of Mr. Lacy's proof text, is Luke xvii. 3, "If thy brother sin against thee, rebuke him; if he repent, forgive him." Before this text can be made to support Mr. L.'s views of forgiveness it must be shown that Christ was then speaking of personal wrongs and offences. It seems evident from the connection in which it occurs, however, that Christ was giving directions to his disciples, not in reference to their personal, but their church or representative duties. We presume that Mr. L. himself, in "a sober second thought," will admit this. It is obvious, that when we are called upon to act as the representatives of God's truth and God's cause, we must act just as we believe God himself would act if he were personally present. The principles which we bring to the adjustment of issues between man and man, are not the same as those we apply to the adjustment of the issues between God and man. This text then does not render aid to Mr. L.'s theory.

Thus far we have attempted to show only that the argument of Mr. L. is unsound. We now attempt to show that it is our duty to bestow forgiveness upon an offender against us personally, whether he asks it or not. And just here we may observe, en passant, that it is difficult for us to distinguish between the spirit of forgiveness, and the bestowment of forgiveness. Mr. L. makes a distinction, but what real difference there is between the two would puzzle a Scotch metaphysician.

In commenting on the passage, "Forgive us our sins as we forgive those that sin against us," (and it is the only part of that prayer on which Christ does comment) he says, without limitation or condition, "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if ye forgive not men their trespasses neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." Here it would seem that the doctrine of absolute and unconditional forgiveness is directly and uncompromisingly taught. And if our reading of the text be right, I see not how this doctrine can be avoided when text and comment are brought together.

Again, how can a spirit or an act of unforgiveness be reconciled, or at all compatible with the Lord's teaching in Matt. v. 44, 45—"But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that dispitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven. Let Mr. Lacy fit his theory and the spirit of that scripture together if he can. How does that theory harmonize with the Lord's teaching again, in the parable recorded in Matt. xviii. 21. 35? Let every one who reads this, read that also; and the conclusion must be obvious. Mr. Lacy's theory would produce a humility just a little too exalted to be humility at all.

LETTER FROM ST. FRANCISVILLE.

> "Leaves have their time to fall,
> And flowers to wither at the north-wind's breath,
> And stars to set—but all,
> Thou hast all seasons for thy own, O Death!"

This place, so lately filled with mourners from the ill-fated Princess, still wears a gloomy aspect. The fresh sod tells me of the arrow which pierced the heart of one most tenderly beloved! Terrible is the stroke which has fallen upon us in the loss of L. D. Brewer, my nephew—cut down in the prime of manhood, with most brilliant prospects blooming around him—and the vista opening in the future, with a distant perspective tinged with hope's fascinating colors. Tears of grief cannot bring back the object of our affections. The eye is closed—the ear is sealed—the tongue is mute! The evening breeze gently fans the cedar which throws its evergreen leaves over his new-made grave, where its dewy tears fall in silence; and his funeral dirge is sung by the feathered choir lodged within its branches.

The overshadowing trees, which adorn this hallowed cemetery, form a beautiful canopy for the dead—rendered doubly dear by the last treasure of blighted hope, a friend, deposited within its precincts. Standing by his grave, brought back by association the freshness of his early youth among the sweet green hills of New England, when, under the fostering care of the sainted Fisk, the little boy received the first impress of moral and intellectual truths. There are heart-memories written upon the tablet of the soul, which time cannot erase—they form part of our existence—mould the character and destiny of man. He was a child of many prayers—and his sainted mother's went up like incense before the throne of God, ere she left her child a motherless one on earth, and fled to heaven!

His sister drooped like a morning flower beneath a Southern sun, and passed away. Their sepulchres are wide apart, but their spirits have met, we hope, in a more genial clime.

It is sad to look on such a grave—leaving behind a widow's heart stricken with grief, and young buds of hope to bloom alone under variable skies. But there is an eye that looks upon the fatherless and the widow, and will protect them. And that father, bending beneath the weight of years, has his only prop taken, to fall back upon the everlasting arms which alone can sustain him. But there is a world of beauty and blessedness, suited to the immortal powers, where they will expand, and find deathless objects to gaze upon with increasing delight through vast eternity. S. B. THOMAS.

ENGLISH BIBLE TRANSLATIONS.

WICKLIFFE'S BIBLE.—This was the first translation made into the language. It was translated by John Wickliffe, about the year 1530, but never printed, though there are manuscript copies of it in several of the public libraries.

TYNDALE'S BIBLE.—The translation by William Tyndale, assisted by Miles Coverdale, was the first printed Bible in the English language. The New Testament was published in 1526. It was revised and republished in 1530. In 1532 Tyndale and his associates finished the whole Bible, except the Apocrypha, and printed it abroad.

MATTHEW'S BIBLE.—While Tyndale was preparing a second edition of his Bible he was taken up and burned for heresy at Flanders. On his death, Coverdale and John Rogers revised it, and added a translation of the Apocrypha. It was dedicated to Henry VIII. in 1537, and was printed at Hamburg under the borrowed name of Thomas Matthew, whence it was called Matthew's Bible.

CRANMER'S BIBLE.—This was the first Bible printed by authority in England, and publicly set up in churches. It was Tyndale's version, revised by Coverdale, and examined by Cranmer, who added a preface to it, whence it was called Cranmer's Bible. It was printed by Crafton, one of the largest volumes published in 1540. After being adopted, suppressed, and restored under successive reigns, a new edition was brought out in 1562.

THE GENEVA BIBLE.—Some English exiles at Geneva, in Queen Mary's reign, viz.: Coverdale, Goodman, Gilbe, Samson, Cole, Witting and Knox, made a new translation; which was called the Geneva Bible. In 1560 it was published in octavo, in small but fine black letter. In it the chapters were divided into verses, but without any breaks for them.

THE BISHOP'S BIBLE.—Archbishop Parker engaged Bishops and other learned men to bring out a new translation. They did so in 1568, in large folio. It made what was afterwards called the great English Bible, and commonly called the Bishop's Bible. In 1569 it was published in octavo, in small but fine black letter. In it the chapters were divided into verses, but without any breaks for them.

MATTHEW PARKER'S BIBLE.—The Bishop's Bible underwent some corrections, and was printed in folio, 1572, and called Matthew Parker's Bible. This version was used in the churches for forty years.

THE DOUAY BIBLE.—The New Testament was brought out by the Roman Catholics in 1584, and called the Romanish New Testament. It was condemned by the Queen of England, and copies were seized by her authority and destroyed. In 1609 and 1610 the Old Testament was added, and the whole published at Douay—hence called the Douay Bible.

KING JAMES' BIBLE.—The version now in use was brought out by King James' authority in 1611. Fifty-four learned men were employed to accomplish the work of revising. From death or other causes, seven of these failed to enter upon it. The remaining forty-seven were ranged under six divisions, and had different portions of the Bible assigned to these divisions. They entered upon their task in 1607. After some three or four years of diligent labor the whole was completed. This version was generally adopted, and other versions fell into disuse. It has continued in use for nearly two hundred years.

OUR EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

The connection of the evangelical Churches with education is becoming every day a more significant and striking fact. It is a growing opinion, that the relation of the Church to this great work is a divine relation—one of its high and holy offices—one of its deepest interests—one of its profoundest responsibilities. Nor is this sentiment so much the result of abstract reasoning as it is the spontaneous outgrowth of spiritual instincts. The [illegible] Churches, actuated by a common impulse, are beginning to feel an earnest solicitude on the subject of education as a reflex effect of their work in other portions of God's vineyard, and they are coming to this momentous task in a spirit which has been awakened and trained in other modes of Christian activity. One duty, if well discharged, prepares the way for another duty; one trust honorably fulfilled leads to another trust; the power to discern our work grows out of the power of doing our work; and in this way, the Church, executing her main office in preaching the gospel, enters on other provinces of spiritual service and perfects herself for the performance of her whole duty. By such means, the conscience of the Church is cultivated to a full and emphatic realisation of her transcendent position. The present concern on the subject of education is an illustration of this law; for it has certainly sprung from that close contact with the intellectual and moral condition of the world, which has characterised our preaching and the general benevolent movements which the Church has directed.

But let us not overstate the fact. Without doubt, the modern Church is theoretically alive to the importance of education as a spiritual agency. Thousands of dollars have been freely contributed to inaugurate and sustain the work. Earnest hearts are in the field, and fervent prayers, throbbed from souls that feel the burden of their charge, are rising to God for his blessing. Yet the fact cannot be concealed, that as yet our views are immature, our purposes are but half-formed, our efforts are irregular and unsteady, in behalf of this vast enterprise. We need a more vital and authoritative conviction of the sanctity of this work, and above all, the firm confidence of Christian faith that it is God's work, to be solemnly undertaken in his fear as a divine stewardship, and to be faithfully pursued as a branch of activity fraught with immense consequences. Perhaps there is no department of action so intimately connected with truth and depth of sentiment—so fully suspended in its results on a state of feeling and sympathy—as education. To give our money to contribute our patronage, this is well, but there is a far greater thing to do, and that is to have our hearts thoroughly enlisted in education as a Christian office, surpassed by nothing in its intensity of meaning and breadth of application. Every one of our institutions ought to represent the very soul of the Church, ought to be alive with intellectual and moral power, ought to be a witness to the age of whatever is refined and beautiful and noble in religious thought; and, so endowed with the attributes of a living Christianity, and so armed in chosen championship for the battle of the times, ought to be known and felt as a mighty instrumentality in the aggressive march of Christ's Cross.

It is just here, that we are painfully sensible of the low state of thinking and feeling prevalent in the Church on this deeply interesting subject. The general disposition of the Church is to be satisfied with our schools, if they maintain a respectable attitude before the community, and if, in their tone of opinion and disciplinary management, they conform to the acknowledged requisites of religious sentiment. But assuredly something more is demanded of these institutions. A good scholarship does not discharge the obligations resting on them. A studious care of the morals of pupils, a formal adherence to the methods of sound and salutary government, are surely not enough to comply with the responsibilities assumed in such cases by the Church. For it must be clear to every thinking man, that if the Church go no farther than accredited scholarship and respectable morality in these institutions, she occupies no higher ground than the world, in education. We are no advocates for sectarianism in our schools. But we do insist, that the Church ought to perform the office of education as a Christian Society, and that she is utterly derelict in duty and treacherous to her trust, if she fail in this particular.

This is simply a practical question. Religion ought to be the first and last consideration in the studies, order, arrangements of these Institutions. And whatever else is effected, whatever intellectual and moral charms are thrown around the character of the schools, they ought to be held as a failure, if they do not send forth a redeeming influence among their pupils, and largely augment the intelligent piety and working zeal of the Church. The religion of daily life ought to penetrate the whole spirit of these establishments, so that every recitation all contact of mind with mind, all processes of instruction, and all relations of intercourse, should be heartily and transformingly imbued with the unction coming from above. Our teachers have a sacred ministry. And what a ministry is it? A ministry to childhood—a ministry of intellect and tenderness and watchful love—a ministry of patience and of prayer—and although not technically recognised as a ministry, yet, beyond question it is a ministry of Providence that cannot be exaggerated in its issues and results. Life is put into their hands. Souls are surrendered to their guidance and love. The best treasures of home are laid on their bosoms, and Christ's dear lambs are given to their friendly crook. And, besides all this, these are the ranks out of which the learning and strength of the church are to be recruited. These are our resources for Christian talent and genius. And hence, if we fail here of the great redeeming purposes of the cross, what can we hope to do in qualifying the church to fight that tremendous battle, which daily thickens in interest as a mighty struggle of mind and heart with the principalities and powers of darkness? Never before has the Church had such an opportunity to act on the intellect of society. Never before has she had such valuable agencies under her control. The five talents of the parable are doubled, trebled, quadrupled. Science and art are in our service. Learning and genius are waiting our bidding. But all this is nothing, if they are not baptised with the Holy Ghost. Machinery has no magic to do the work. Living souls are God's ministering angels; and if we send them forth from our seats of knowledge, every household will glow as Abraham's tent, in Mamre, with the luminous beauty and radiant splendors of an immortal sphere.

TWENTY-TWO YEARS AGO.

In glancing over an old Methodist Almanac, for the year 1837, we were impressed, says the North Carolina Almanac, with the change and progress of men and things since that not very remote period. The Church, North and South, was then united. The income to the Missionary society for the preceding year is set down at $61,397 61. The Missionary revenue is now about five times that amount. The number of Colleges then under the care of the Church was seven; now "their name is legion." The number of members of the Church is given at 651,651; being a decrease, for the year, of 4126, over which false prophets no doubt predicted the speedy downfall of Methodism. And yet, in the brief space of only twenty-two years, the statistics show an increase of nearly three-fold! In that year there were only three Church periodicals issued: and now we suppose there are several scores of them.

THE GROWING POWER OF NEWSPAPERS.

If we cannot claim that the newspaper is one of the products of this age, we can certainly affirm, that its present power, its position as a recognised influence, its immense and yet increasing agency in the advancement of the welfare of society, are due to the peculiar circumstances of the day. A newspaper is simply the popular mind in the form of a daily or a weekly literature. It is the popular mind, in its opinions, its wants, its aims, its intelligence and activity, its virtue and religion. It is the popular mind, in business, in trade and commerce, in domestic and national life. And just because the mind of the masses is now thoroughly leavened with the great ideas of the century, and is awaking to the consciousness of its long-dormant energies, the newspaper is demonstrating its wonderful efficiency in promoting the progress of civilization. No man can doubt that the leadership of all movements is rapidly passing into the newspaper.

Whatever may be the authority of popular orators and statesmen, it cannot be denied that the real controlling force of the day is fast concentrating in the newspaper-press, and that ere long it will be the established sovereignty of the world. A few years hence, what newspapers say will be popular edicts, from which no appeal can be taken. It is here, that opinion will wage its war—here, the terrible battle between might and right, as yet hardly begun, will be fought—and here, the popular creed as respects all matters of belief and policy will write itself down, so that Kings and Rulers may understand precisely what they can do and what they cannot do.

This is a foregone conclusion. The power of the newspaper is a fixed fact, and must be accepted. Now, the practical question is, how to turn it to the best account and render it most serviceable to the public weal.

With the secular press we have now nothing to do. Our aim is to show that the religious press, the religious newspaper, has an office of its own, has a vast work to accomplish. What is this office, what is this work? Plainly this, viz: to take careful cognizance of the movements of the times, to watch the current opinions of the day, to check error and advocate truth in relation to the immediate interests of the hour no less than in their bearing on the permanent well-being of society, to brave the broad range of popular mind—and with that alertness of spirit and promptitude of action belonging to ready resources and available skill, to befriend what is good and resist what is evil. A religious newspaper is nothing less than a champion for the true, the just, the good. Its business is to fight valiantly for the truth, that it concerns the world to know and to love—fight earnestly and warmly, but honorably and kindly, and in all Christian meekness and charity, for the faith and hope delivered to our guardianship and protection. Just in proportion as this work is done, a religious newspaper fills its province. So far, then, it is identical in spirit and aim with the pulpit, and with every other mode of Christian activity.

But we must not forget that, in another light, a religious newspaper is a specific agency, adapted to the circumstances of the day, and using its own peculiar means to promote the good of the world. A great many matters of vital interest to the church and to the community, which no other instrumentality is competent to reach, fall properly under the control of the press—and here, it may be eminently serviceable to God's work. In the examination of public measures, in criticism of books, in the exposure of popular errors, and resistance of popular prejudices, in efforts to elevate and refine taste—in conservatism, where conservatism is not the stand-still, do-nothing policy of stupidity, arrogance and selfish conceit—in progress, where progress is true growth and wise enthusiasm—a religious newspaper is an invaluable servant of the age. And in this office, it must have all reasonable and pure freedom. If it is hampered and restricted by any other rules than those of religious justice and charity, it is instantly shorn of its strength. It must be as free to condemn as it is free to commend—free on all sides, and free for all work—dealing plainly, frankly, boldly—but guided and governed in every thing by the spirit of an enlightened, genial and loving piety. Moreover, a religious newspaper has no greater virtue to maintain than this temper of independency. Fearlessness is one of its cardinal excellencies. Without this quality, it is a mere time-server. A religious newspaper has to assist in forming a public opinion, and this is often a nobler work than to represent public opinion. Conservatism may be a crime; and hence it is the business of a religious newspaper to know the real wants of the times, to appreciate all fair and right claims, and to stimulate men to advance and enter on the ample inheritance that Providence opens before them.

Some good people think that a religious newspaper ought to be a very serious affair, and so it ought; but, perhaps, their idea of seriousness is wide of the mark. If by seriousness is meant a present, living, deeply-felt conviction of the transcendent importance of Christianity, and a firm and unfaltering obedience to its sentiments, we subscribe with all our soul to the truth. But this does not exclude cheerful and buoyant blood, the electric nerve, the sprightly word, all lawful humor and all abounding freshness of thought and manner. A dull newspaper is by no means a serious newspaper, any more than an owl is an eagle. Seriousness is earnestness—deep thoughtfulness—profound convictions—honest and faithful feeling. A thing may be improper in the pulpit, that is not at all improper in a religious newspaper. Christian liberty is the same principle every where, but Christian liberty, adhering to God's law, may differ in degree according to circumstances, and may justly claim privileges in one connection that it would be wrong to exercise in another relation.

MINISTERIAL EDUCATION SOCIETY.

Mobile, May 24, 1859.

Mr. Editor.—The conference year is swiftly passing away, and among the various benevolent enterprises of the Church in Alabama Conference, there is none, I think, that should, with more hearty good-will, be cared for than the Ministerial Education Society.

We have some fifteen young Ministers under our fostering care at Summerfield, receiving a gratuitous literary, religious and biblical training. These young men are in indigent circumstances, and, with our aid, promise a large return to the Church. I do wish our brethren of means, that have been temporally blessed of God, could be duly impressed with the magnitude of the privilege of participating in qualifying these young Ministers of God for future usefulness. They are young men of much promise; of deep piety, burning zeal, and are already doing much good. While they are making rapid improvement in their literary studies under Brother Connerly and the faculty; they are receiving much assistance from their most faithful and efficient pastor, Bro. Murrah, who so benefits them by precepts and examples, that when they go into the itinerant work they will be felt and appreciated.

What a noble cause is this! And may I not commend the example of a brother in a sister Church to our brethren of large means? This brother has made by industry a large fortune, and feeling the force of his stewardship to God, he is now educating at his own cost some fifteen young ministers, as one of the means of doing good, and proposes to increase the number to fifty during his life; besides giving freely to the Missionary and other benevolent enterprises. He feels the luxury of doing good, and is an ornament to the Baptist church.

Some of us do but little by personal effort to advance the cause of Christ. Thank God, by the proper use of our money that God has given us, we may do much to fit others for the active field of labor.

Now, brethren of the Ministry, let me say if we need means to pay the board and tuition of the Ministers, you have only to present this cause to our lay brethren, and we will get it. Let us be prompt in doing so, and the effort will be a blessing to you, the Church and the world.

R. A. Baker, President
Ministerial Ed. Society, Ala. Conference.

THE CHURCH EVANGELIST.

Mr Editor: Some of the friends of the Church paper enterprize may want to know something of the movement of the time. I have been absent, about two months, on matters of business more or less important to the future developement of the plan I advocate for publishing a weekly paper that will make something like an effort to meet the wants of our people.

The present plan of publishing eight or ten little papers with a total circulation of less than 50,000 weekly copies, is, for the numbers of our people, their means and needs, a tolerable near approach to a miserable failure. They all, with perhaps one or two exceptions, give my plan the cold shoulder. But, had I the funds to spare, I would not allow forty such trivial chills to paralyze my efforts, but would put it into operation at once.

I have got my apparatus for directing the papers as near perfection as such things generally get, and a distinguished scientist says it is almost entitled to vote. I expect when fairly tested, after a little use, it will do as much as thirty persons can do in one week. I mean in directing papers and magazines. Besides, it need take no more room than a sewing machine, and it will not break an office to procure one. This is the fruit of my endeavours to economize the cost of the paper.

Besides, I have for some years been gradually unfolding a plan for turning cypress bark into paper. We have millions of tons of it, you know, that are thrown away at the saw mills. It can be made into good white paper. My own plans would probably have triumphed, but I found those who had time and means to experiment who were in advance of me, and I yielded to their better methods. But between us, I can afford to make my own paper for the Church Evangelist, and at a sum so much less than you pay for paper that I will not startle you by the figures till I show you the sheets. At my earliest convenience, I am going to Memphis to lay my plans and views before the citizens generally, and propose to establish there a weekly newspaper of the above name, which, with suitable aid, shall have the largest circulation of any paper in the world—a nice thing to say about Memphis, that—and she will not tell me nay! It is quietly hinted, that the citizens of Memphis would be ready, when the war is over and times right up again, to give a handsome token of their—approval of the plan, etc. We shall see. Memphis is a place!

One other word. For six weeks past I have been in very poor health. My hearing has suffered from neuralgia and my general health from the same cause has been such that I have not been able to preach more than four or five times in two months. Going from the pulpit one, two, five or ten miles, more or less, as is often done, with clothes damp from perspiration, having no one-room or place for change, has killed, is killing, and will kill—by bronchitis, neuralgia, and colds—more preachers than many are prepared to believe.

I do not expect to be able to visit and solicit donations for endowing the Church Evangelist as I hoped to do, for the reason of my health and that of another, but will correspond with a host of noble souls. I got the General Minutes so late—about the first of May—that I could not get into correspondence with the preachers as soon as I had desired, but I hope to hear from a goodly member of them soon.

C. K. Marshall.

SKETCH OF THE BOARD OF BROKERS.

The Rev. Mr. Cuyler, in a letter to The Christian Intelligencer, gives the following notice of a visit he paid to the Broker's Board with a friend:

"The Board of Brokers is worth every pastor's visiting; he would find several of his congregation there, and would be surprised to find how differently a man looks while he is listening to 'sixtbly,' and 'seventhly,' from what he does while roaring out, 'I bid one hundred for the lot, seller sixty days.' The minister might get a few lessons in earnestness of manner, too; for of all animated speakers I know of none who can surpass the Board of Brokers, when 'New York Central' is under discussion. There is still another reason for a clerical visit to the penetralia of this stock market. That Board room is the house of worship to many a man for six days of the week—a worship so intense, that he finds it exceedingly difficult to withdraw his heart from it, when he enters God's house on the Sabbath. In that room is his altar. Before Mammon's shrine he bows down. And whatever he may be in God's temple, he is pretty certain to render a sincere homage when his heart is paying its devotions to the almighty dollar. Not that we believe that there is any more worldliness in a Broker's Board, than there is in a Merchant's Exchange, or an Agricultural Convention; but it is a lamentable fact that human hearts worship gold with a more undivided affection, and a more intense devotion, than they commonly worship their God. Idolatry intrudes every where; we need not go far to find pulpits in which the very minister has his idol in the sacred desk; every word he utters is, secretly, a self-homage.

"But to the Broker's Board. They met in an out-of the way hall back of Exchange place, in a place as difficult to get into, or out of, as Aladdin's cave. In the lobby are newsboys, and the apple women, and a busy lad who is sending telegrams up through a tube for transmission to Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. The moment a sale takes place within, the young Mercury hints the fact by lightning to stockjobbers three hundred miles off. As we enter the Board-room, we are saluted by a Babel uproar of voices. We find about one hundred and twenty gentlemen assembled (with their hats on, like English Parliament) in a sort of legislative hall. Each man has his desk, at which he sits until some call of a new stock starts him up, and then he runs out toward the centre of the room, shaking his finger violently and vociferating, "I'll take you up," "seventy five for the lot," "that's my bid." "Seller thirty days."

"Imagine a score of excited men all shouting together such short ejaculations as the above. To us it is confusion worse confounded. But the clerk manages to catch all the bids and sales, and after the tempest subsides, he quietly calls off the list. Then the president—a well-salaried officer—announces a new stock. Sometimes he will call a dozen stocks with no bids, but the moment that he strikes some 'speculative stock' like 'Pacific Mail,' or 'New York Central Railroad,' there is an explosion of excitement. Men leap to their feet, fingers are shaken and pointed back and forth, and the roar of voices is deafening. The ursa major of the stock boards is a celebrated broker, whom we need not name. His financial fame is world-wide. While the bids are made, the workings of his countenance remind us of Brougham in the House of Lords. He steps out from his desk and snaps his finger toward another broker, calling out, 'I'll take your lot at thirty days.' 'Then,' whispers my friend, 'by that simple operation fifty thousand dollars changed hands!' The thought flashes into our mind—what a noble church that would build! In fact, we should not ask more than the avails of a single moment's transaction, to build therewith a church for the people that would gather and gladden two thousand souls on God's Sabbaths.

"The most noticeable things to us in the Broker's Board were the intensity of excitement at certain times, when contested stocks were called, and the lightning-like rapidity with which decisions were made, and great transactions carried out. Men's minds play there like piston-rods in steam-engines. The strokes cannot be counted. To an experienced eye there is only whirl; but the accomplished eye sees perfect system working results with vast rapidity. I do not envy the man who lives in such a Babel of conflicting sounds, and draws his 'daily bread' from such a hot oven of excitement. It requires strong and resolute religious principle to hold fast to one's moral moorings when such sudden gales of selfish temptation are constantly striking the canvas. A man ought to be a firm Christian before he becomes a broker.

"The converse is true. A broker may be a firm and healthy Christian."

THE LONDON TIMES NEWSPAPER.

As far back as 1823, Hazlitt, in his terse, graphic style, thus draws the character of this extraordinary newspaper:

"The Times newspaper is, we suppose, entitled to the character it gives itself—of being 'the leading Journal of Europe;' and is, perhaps, the greatest engine of temporary opinion in the world. Still it is not to our taste—either in matter or manner. It is elaborate, but heavy; full, but not relishing; it is stuffed up with official documents, with matter-of-fact details. It seems intended to be deposited in the office of the Keeper of the Records, and might be imagined to be composed as well as printed with a steam-engine. It is pompous, dogmatical, and full of pretensions; but neither light, various, nor agreeable. It sells more, and contains more, than any other paper; and when you have said this, you have said all. It presents a most formidable front to the inexperienced reader. It makes a toll of pleasure. It is said to be calculated for persons in business, and yet it is the business of a whole morning to get through it. Eating voluminous details of what had better be omitted, the same things are better done in the Chronicle. To say nothing of poetry (which may be thought too frivolous and attenuated for the atmosphere of the city,) the prose is inferior. No equally sterling articles can be referred to in it, either for argument or wit. More, in short, is effected in the Morning Chronicle, without the formality, and without the effort. The Times is not a classical paper. It is a commercial paper—a paper of business, and it is conducted on principles of business. It floats with the tide; it sails with the stream. It has no principle, as we take it. It is not ministerial; it is not patriotic; but it is civic. It is the lungs of the British metropolis; the mouthpiece, oracle, and echo of the Stock Exchange; the representative of the mercantile interest. One would think so much gravity of style might be accompanied with more steadiness and weight of opinion. But the Times conforms to the changes of the time. It bears down upon a question, like a first-rate man-of-war, with streamers flying, and all hands on deck, but if the first broadside does not answer, turns short upon it, like a triremed galley, firing off a few paltry squibs to cover its retreat. It takes up no falling cause; fights no up-hill battle; advocates no great principle; holds out a helping hand to no oppressed or obscure individual. It is ever strong upon the stronger side.' Its style is magniloquent; its spirit is not magnanimous. It is valiant, swaggering, insolent, with a hundred thousand readers at its heels; but the instant the rascal rout turned round with the whiff and wind of some fell circumstance, The Times—the renegade, inconsistent Times—turns with him! Let the mob shout, let the city roar, and the voice of The Times is heard above them all, with outrageous, deafening clamor; but let the vulgar hubbub cease, and no whisper, no echo of it, is ever after heard in The Times. Like Billy Bottom in the play, it then 'aggravates its voice so, or if it were any nightingale.' Its coarse ribaldry is turned to a harmless jest; its swelling rhodomontade sinks to a vapid commonplace; and the editor amuses himself, in the interval, before another great explosion, by collecting and publishing, from time to time, affidavits of the numbers of his paper sold in the last stormy period of the Press."

DEATH OF DR. LARDNER.

The death of Dr. Dionysius Lardner is announced. His age was sixty-nine. Dr. Lardner was born in Dublin in 1790. His father was a lawyer. Young Lardner entered Trinity College, Dublin, and graduated in 1817. The next ten years he spent in Cambridge. He had already become somewhat distinguished for his mathematical and scientific studies. He first published treatises on geometry, trigonometry, and the differential and integral calculus; afterwards, a commentary on the first six books of Euclid; a treatise on solid geometry, which became a text book; and another on the steam engine; contributed articles on mathematical subjects to the Edinburg Encyclopædia, and the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, and wrote for the Library of Useful Knowledge a series of articles on Natural Philosophy. In 1827, at the age of thirty-four, he was elected Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in the London University, and in the following year removed to London. The establishment of the Cabinet Cyclopædia under his immediate direction brought him prominently before the English public. Among its regular contributors were Sir John Herschel, Sir David Brewster, Scott, Southey, McIntosh, and others; Dr. Lardner contributed to its pages. During this period he also contributed papers on physical science to the Edinburgh Review, and other periodicals. From 1830 to 1840 his services were in request by the British Railway Companies in the departments of scientific survey.

In 1840 Dr Lardner visited this country, and in 1841 gave a course of scientific lectures in New York, which were immensely popular. He subsequently lectured in Boston, Philadelphia, Charleston, Mobile, New Orleans, St. Louis, and other places in the United States. He spent four years in this way. In 1845 Dr. Lardner returned to Europe, and has lived since that time in Paris. In 1850 he published a statistical work, entitled Railway Economy. In 1851 he contributed to the London Times a series of papers upon the Great Exhibition, subsequently republished in a volume. He then published a series of elementary treatises in six volumes, entitled the Hand-book of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy. In 1853 he commenced the Museum of Science and Art, a periodical work. He afterwards completed a work on Animal Physics, contributed to the Royal Astronomical Society.

Dr. Lardner was twice married, first to a Miss Flood. When he came to this country he was attended by the wife of a Captain Heavyside, who sued Dr. Lardner for damages and recovered £8,000. After Captain Heavyside's death he married the widow. The affair was much discussed at the time, and the history of it was once familiar. It has been alleged of Dr. Lardner that he said "no steam vessel could ever successfully cross the Atlantic ocean." It is stated that this is a perversion of a remark made by him at a meeting in Dublin College, during the Congress of the Association of Science in that city, when he gave his opinion that no steam vessel that he had seen could possibly carry enough fuel to accomplish the voyage from Europe to America.

THE BOLIVAR ESTATES.

The estates of Simon Bolivar, in Venezuela, are to be sold in London, on the 18th of June, 1859. They comprise a tract of land, fifty miles long by thirty in width. Eleven hundred and fifty square miles, having forests of mahogany, cedar, guayacum, liguum vitæ, and fustic. These belong to the estate of the great Liberator of South America, who, after many trials, battles and hardships, gave the Spanish army a signal defeat near Carraccas, and entered that city in triumph in 1823. This final action led to the independence of the country of this South American Washington, as he has been styled. Gen. Paez served under Bolivar, and enjoyed his entire confidence. He has lately been recalled from exile, and is now President of the Republic of Venezuela.

"THE UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH."

Our Episcopal friends have given a very imposing name to the Institution which they propose to establish in the mountains of Tennessee—and they seem to meet with success in raising funds. We are glad of this; we hope they may establish a good denominational school, for we believe in that class of institutions.

It will not require a very comprehensive establishment to accommodate the young men of that denomination in the South, and that class will furnish nearly all they need to provide for. The idea of that Church becoming the educators of Southern youth generally, is simply preposterous. For it has come to be understood, that all their schools are proselyting establishments. We know of no exception among the institutions of the Church proper. The location selected for the proposed University is exactly in point. Instead of choosing a location in some community where the different denominations have houses of worship, and where the sons of their members could enjoy the advantages of the school, and attend upon the forms of worship which accord with the faith of their parents—a point remote from towns and churches is chosen, where the young men are to be shut up to the forms of worship and influence of the Episcopal Church, in the hope that by four or five years drilling they may be brought to that faith. Milk-sickness, want of society, and every thing else must be braved to accomplish this. Had communities, competing, taken this into the account, they would have understood from the beginning what chance of success they had. Now, to this manœuvering, no member of another Church, who values the faith and piety of his son, will submit. Yet upon this idea the whole school proceeds. What Church but the Episcopal or Romish, ever thinks of selecting such locations, and what is the animus of the Institutions of both! Let those who do not wish their children deceived away from the Church and faith of their adoption look at this plan and beware. There are just as good institutions of learning as this will be, where no efforts at proselyting are made; the teachers are above it. We may hereafter give some facts in proof of our position.

STATISTICS OF ITALY.

The Annuario Statistico Italiano for 1858 publishes the following details, which are of interest at the present moment: The population of Italy amounts to no less than 27,107,047 inhabitants. They are divided into fifteen circumscriptions; eight, containing 19,913,304 souls, are under Italian governments, and seven, with a population of 6,193,743, obey foreign rule. Italy contains 110 provinces and 10,012 communes, and is one of the countries in which the largest cities and towns are to be found, 19 of them having more than 50,000 inhabitants, and eight—Rome, Naples, Palermo, Venice, Florence, Milan, Genoa and Turin—exceed 100,000. Almost all the population are Roman Catholics, the number of those who profess other Christian creeds only amounting to 36,676, and the Jews to 41,497. The births far exceed the deaths; the increase in the population is particularly remarkable in Sicily and Tuscany, where it may double in 73 years. Italy alone has very nearly one-half as many bishoprics as there are in the whole of Europe, 256 out of 535. The average is 90,000 Catholics for each diocese, and in the Roman States there is one bishop for 400,000 souls.

The regular and secular clergy of both sexes count in Italy 189,000, and they are, as compared with the number of the population, as one to 142. The clergy are more numerous in Sicily than in any other part of Italy, or perhaps in the world, the number of priests, monks and nuns being 33,226 or one out of sixty-nine inhabitants. There are nearly three hundred journals published in Italy: of which number 117 are in the Sardinian States, although they contain only one-fifth of the total population. About the middle of 1858, Italy possessed 1757 kilometres (five-eighths of a mile each) of railways completed; 2339 in course of construction; and 634 for which concessions have been granted. One of the principal branches of industry is the production of silk, and in ordinary years the value of that article is from 200,000,000f. to 230,000,000f. Lombardy alone, which is only the fifteenth part of Italy, produces one-third. The revenues of the different Italian States amount to about 600,000,000f., and the expenses to 640,000,000f. The public debt is 2,000,000f. Commerce is active, but business is much impeded by the high tariffs in many of the States, and by the lines of custom-houses. The mercantile marine of Italy is more numerous, in proportion to the extent of country, than that of any other nation in Europe, England excepted.

THE DYING KING.

The foreign correspondent of the Anti-slavery Standard paints a sombre picture of the present position of affairs in the Court of Naples, and of the death-bed of Ferdinand III. The King is perishing by a horrible disease, which makes him repulsive to all his attendants, and from which he suffers the most terrible agonies. Never, says one of his doctors, did a victim of the inquisition suffer such fearful torture. He sees no one but the Queen, the physicians and his servants; the most careful methods are taken to inform the people that his Majesty is doing well. Whenever a Council of Ministers takes place, it is presided over by the hereditary Prince, or the oldest son of the Queen. After the session, the Ministers are introduced into the apartment of the King. His hand is extended from within the curtains of the bed. They kiss it, and depart; the official journal then announces that his Majesty presided at the ministerial council. Naples is filled with rumors and intrigues; it is said that an attempt is to be made to raise to the throne the son of the Queen in place of the hereditary Prince; strong efforts are made to discredit the intelligence of the latter, and he is kept almost a prisoner at the dreary palace in Caserta, where the King lies dying, and which is more like a hospital than the seat of a court, and more like a tomb than a hospital. Prince Lucien Murat also has hopes that the death of Ferdinand just at this crisis will be of advantage to him, and that the Emperor Napoleon will be compelled to assist him to the throne of Naples.

The very last European news says the King is "dead, sure."

THE LATE PROFESSOR OLMSTEAD.

The death of this eminent Professor has already been announced by telegraph. He died at New Haven, on the morning of the 13th, at the age of 68. He had been for nearly half a century an officer of Yale College, and at the time of his death was the senior member of the Faculty. He was the author of several standard educational works, and on subjects of science he has been a large contributor to the periodical press. He enjoyed a high reputation, abroad as well as at home, as a scientific man. The Journal of Commerce, of the 14th, says that at the close of his winter course of lectures, he was in a state of great prostration which was soon followed by acute neuralgia. The disease became more aggravated, until terminating in death.

Denison Olmstead, L. L. D., graduated at Yale College in 1813, was elected Professor of Chemistry in North Carolina in 1815, and served ten years; (when there, he made a geological survey of that State, the first State survey made in this country,) and in 1825 he was elected Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Yale College, which place he filled at the time of his death.

Rev. Dr. Rivers, President of Florence Wesleyan University, Ala., gives a touching account in the Nashville Advocate, of the death of his venerable father.

Our Regular Agents should always settle confused, disputed, or doubtful accounts, on their own judgment, acting for the Advocate as for themselves.

LOUIS NAPOLEON.

When he was twenty years old, (says the New [illegible] News,) the present Emperor of France wrote a remarkable work, entitled "Political and Military [illegible] tions on the Swiss Confederation." It attracted attention, so much that the government of Thurgovia, (Switzerland,) soon after its publication, conferred upon him the right of citizenship in that Canton. He returned thanks in the following letter, which, in connection with his subsequent career, will give insight into the true character of this remarkable man:

"Arenenburg, May 15, 1830.—Sir: I accept the rights of a citizen of Thurgovia with the greatest pleasure. I am glad that a new tie binds me to that country which, for sixteen years, has extended to me its generous hospitality. My position as an exile [illegible] man doubly sensible to the interest you show me. In the Frenchman and as a Bonaparte I am proud of being a citizen of a free country."

In 1834, he published a work on Artillery, for the use of the Swiss troops. For this he was made a Colonel of Artillery. In his acknowledgment he says:

"I am proud of being numbered among the citizens of a State in which the sovereignty of the people is considered as the basis of the Constitution, and where every citizen is ready to sacrifice himself for the liberty and independence of his country."

But the most singular sentiment, in view of the charge of despot and tyrant made against him, is contained in the following letter.

"Arenenburg, Jan 30, 1835.—As to my position, as to me, I understand it fully, although it is very complex. I feel that as yet, I am only known by name, but by deeds. I am an aristocrat by birth, a democrat by principle, and by opinion. I owe all to inheritance and to everything from election. Courted by some for my name, by others for my title—taxed with personal ambition soon as I step beyond my accustomed sphere—[illegible] apathy and indifference if I remain quiet—[illegible] inspiring both liberals and absolutists with fear because of the influence of my name, I have no political [illegible] but among those who, accustomed to the caprices of fortune, think that, by some chance, I may one day be useful. It is because I see all the difficulties that have impeded my progress in the beginning of any career that I have made it a rule to follow the impulses of my reason and my conscience, and never to regret a consideration of secondary import once when I was sure that I am acting for the general interest; in short, to walk in a straight line without heeding all the difficulties that obstruct my path."

He was twenty-seven years of age when this (the language almost of prophesy) were penned. And in connection with his present position, this letter shows that even at the time he had an appreciation of his coming destiny, and anticipated, as it were by inspiration, the future that lay before him.

THE FUTURE OF ITALY.

A letter from Germany, states that according to the belief of political magnates there, the triumvirate rulers of Russia, France and Sardinia—intend the future of Italy shall be:

1. The Lombardo-Venetian provinces to be transferred to Victor Emmanuel, of Sardinia, who would [illegible] King of Northern Italy.

2. The States of the Church, augmented in territory by the addition of Tuscany, Parma, Lucca and the Sovereign Duchies, ruled by princes of the house of Austria, to be erected into an independent dominion under the sway of Prince Napoleon, (Victor Emmanuel's son-in-law,) as King of Rome. The Pope to have political existence, but still be "Head of the Church as Bishop of Rome.

3. The Kingdom of Naples to preserve her present territorial limits, with Lucien Murat, (born in [illegible] 1803,) as King.

GENERAL CASS.

The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Mercury, in his letter of May 10, says: The Secretary of State, Gen. Cass, has recently had several slight attacks of illness, which have almost reduced him to death's door. A remarkable feature of his sickness is that it passes away quickly, and he seems to be completely restored to his usual vigor of body and mind. His attacks are accompanied by complete insensibility and violent convulsions. Gen. Cass's vigor of mind and body, considering his advanced age, is quite remarkable, and is said to have resulted from his remarkable temperance. He never touches alcoholic drinks; eats two light meals a day; does not wear woolen next to the body, under the belief that it is unwholesome; and in the severest winter weather, in very light clothing. He is, perhaps, the richest man in the State of Michigan, and one of the richest in this country, but is very fond of making and keeping money.

"A Teacher Wanted," is the head of an advertisement on third page, fifth column, of this paper, offering a fine situation.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Boarding European Steamers off Cape Race.

The idea of anticipating the news by European steamers by intercepting them off Cape Race, Newfoundland, was started a number of years since by the New York press, but has not been carried out with much effect, until within a short time, though occasionally a steamer's news was received in this way.

Cape Race, by sea, is between ten and eleven hundred miles distant from New York, one-third of the voyage across the Atlantic. Mr. Farrell, of New York, a boatman of great experience, formerly employed in the same business as now, in connection with the Sandy Hook Telegraph, has taken charge of the news yacht at Cape Race. He succeeded last week in obtaining the news from four steamers, viz: the Arago, the Europa, the Canada and the City of Baltimore. The plan of operations is briefly as follows:

The European steamer runs from England or Ireland across the Atlantic to within a mile or two of Cape Race Light, usually making the trip in seven or eight days. The news yacht is on the alert cruising near the spot, and the steamer as soon as she throws up a signal or fires a gun, to attract attention. The news dispatch is prepared by an agent in England and put in a buoyant tin case to which is affixed a flag so that it can be seen for some distance in the water. The boatmen board the steamer on the spot, obtain the news and start for St. John's Newfoundland, the nearest telegraph station, from whence it is immediately transmitted to all parts of the United States and Canada.

The news before reaching Boston traverses a distance by telegraph of over a thousand miles. First over the Newfoundland line which is constructed across a country that may be [illegible] called a savage wilderness, with hills of granite, deep snows and almost impenetrable woods. Crossing by submarine telegraph from Newfoundland to the American Continent, the dispatch passes over a portion of the Nova Scotia line, thence to the new Brunswick line to the borders of Maine at Calais, where the American line commences, by which it is transmitted to its destination. Occasionally even now a steamer is missed, as for instance the Vanderbilt, which, from its rapid passage across the Atlantic, must have reached Cape Race in six days from Southampton.

The Last of the Mortara Boy.

From the subjoined letter, written by a citizen of Italy traveling in Europe, it appears that the boy Mortara has undergo Catholic tuition until he reaches years of discretion:

"Rome, April 30.—Sir Moses Montefiore has at length presented his memorandum, not to the Pope, but to Cardinal Antonelli. On the 28th instant, by appointment, Mr. Odo Russel presented Sir Moses Montefiore to the Cardinal, who received him with the utmost cordiality and courtesy—to fact his mission is perfect—but the material part of the affair is, that the application ended to disappointment. He, the Cardinal, regrets the case as long closed; nothing could be done to it. It is the law of the land that Jews could not have Christian servants, but if they had them and such incidents took place as the baptism of a child, in their consciences they could not give them up to what they believed to be perdition. Mortara should be well taken care of and educated, and his friends should have free access to him whenever they desired, and, on coming of age, he would be free to follow what course he chose. So ended the interview. It was a bitter pill for poor Sir Moses to swallow.

for he was full of hope; but the Cardinal glided it as well as he could. The onus of the whole question now, then, lies on the Laws and Institutions of the Papal Government, and it is for Jewish capitalists and liberal diplomatists to consider how far such laws are entitled to their support."

France—Departure of Napoleon.

The Paris correspondents of the London papers are unanimous in describing the enthusiasm of the people on the Emperor's departure for the army in Italy as immense. Such a reception the Emperor never before met with, and he was evidently surprised at its unusual warmth. The correspondent of the Times says: The manifestation of popular feeling in Paris on the departure of the Emperor appears to have been marked by a spontaneous enthusiasm which has not been witnessed in that capital for many years. As the carriage passed out of the courtyard of the Tuileries, the Emperor seemed to be taken by surprise at the warmth of the demonstration. He was attended only by a few of the Cent Gardes, and on arriving at the Hotel de Ville the imposing ovation had produced its effect. The Emperor ordered the Gardes to move out of the way, and the carriage was instantly surrounded by the enthusiastic crowd.

The correspondent of the Herald reports that the stern, unbending features of Louis Napoleon quivered with emotion, while the Empress was weeping without any attempt at concealment. The Emperor put his hands out of the carriage, and the barricademakers of the Rue St. Antoine bending over and kissing them, saluted him, with renewed cries of enthusiasm. When the cortege resumed its march, a band of workmen stood between the Imperial carriage and the Cent Gardes, and proceeded with it all the rest of the way, singing patriotic songs, including the Marseillaise. Never has the Emperor received such a conclusive proof of his popularity with the people, and the popularity of the cause which he was setting out to defend was equally demonstrated.

Prussia, Neutral.

A Parliamentary Commission had been sitting at Berlin, to examine the exceptional laws rendered necessary by the present crisis. The Minister of Foreign Affairs declared verbally before the commission that if even it should happen that the efforts of the Italians to obtain a better administration should degenerate into revolutionary movements, Prussia nevertheless would see no reason of giving armed assistance to Austria. The report of the commission contains these words:

"The stronger Prussia becomes by the harmony between the King and people, the less can she interfere by arms in countries where such harmony does not exist. England, it is added, would remain neutral as long as her interests were unaffected; and Russia simply reserved to herself the right of quitting her watchful attitude the day on which other powers interfered in this war."

On the 12th instant, after a six hours debate in the Chamber of Deputies, during which all parties expressed the sentiment of German nationality, the loan asked for by the Government for the military and naval administration, together with further means for raising money, were unanimously voted. On the following day the Upper House unanimously concurred.

Lombardy.

The Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom includes that part of Italy lying North of the Papal States, Parma and Modena, and stretching out from Lake Maggiore and the Ticino to the Adriatic; 245 miles long, 130 broad, embracing 17,547 square miles. Lombardy, of which Milan is the capital, and in which are the cities of Brescia, Como, Mantua and Pavia, has a population of 2,725,750. The Venetian provinces, in about the same area, have 2,281,732; a total of 5,007,472—or 285 to a square mile. Venice, Verona, and Padua are well known cities in this division. These provinces form one of the richest agricultural regions in Europe, producing corn, maize, rice, hemp and flax, besides wine, and great products of the dairy, butter, cheese and much silk.

Austrian Barbarities.

The depredations committed by Austria in Piedmont are now (says the Pays) explained. They are fazzieni executed, not for the immediate wants of the army, but in order to fill the store-houses of Lombardy. Every day long files of wagons laden with hay, vegetables, grain and provisions of all kinds, are seen passing by Novara and Vigevano for the left bank of the Ticino. The Austrians literally strip the Piedmontese provinces and carry of their booty to a place of safety. This manner of making war is that of the ancient barbarians, or rather it is that of an army without money. The Austrians cannot pay for what they take. If they were to plunder in Lombardy they would run the risk of an insurrection of the peasantry. They, therefore, go into Piedmont and make a clean sweep of everything they can find. They do this with a rigor and a cruelty which have created a melancholy and profound sensation in Europe.

Arrests, we learn, are made on a large scale. The Austrians chiefly seize rich young men and the sons of good families, whom they send off to Bohemia as hostages, until the Sardinian Government shall think proper to expel the free corps and the Lombard emigrants. As for those Piedmontese whose poverty permits their being left free, they are incorporated with the ranks of the Austrian army. They are watched and on having arms put into their hands, are compeled to swear on pain of instant death to fight against their fellow-countrymen and not criticise anything that happens. Their oaths are taken on a wooden image of the Savior. The fact is vouched for by a person now in Chivason, who occupies a high position at the camp of San Salvador, near the person of King Victor Emanuel. Every moment brings a fresh requisition; every Austrian chief demands something different from the rest. It is one constant pillage by means of armed force, and the soldiers of Lombardy reap the benefit of it.

Singing the Marseillaise in Paris.

The Paris correspondent of the Boston Traveller, in speaking of the exciting events of the departure of the French Emperor from Paris, relates the following incident: "I saw a whole regiment pass under the windows of the Tuileries, where Louis Napoleon and his Court were standing, and as they reeled along the street, shouted La Marseillaise—that war song, that Rouz des Vaches of liberty, which makes freemen homesick. How the sergens de ville ran from every corner to silence the unchronological rascals! Didn't they bawl furiously! But you should have seen the officers drive back the police, bidding them, in the imperative voice of camps, "Let them alone; they have a right to sing anything they please!" The din of arms bath even drowned the voice of the law. Louder, louder they sang La Marseillaise, the band playing it with inexpressible spirit! The next regiment heard the old acquaintance, and struck up its fellow—Mour Pour la Patrie—the famous song of the Girondins. The Imperiol song—Parlant Pour la Syrie—was heard nowhere; Court "floating Island" is too uncubstantial a food for this crisis. Every soldier feels he is engaged in a contest whose end and whose combatants no one can foresee."

The Ticino.

The little river dividing Lombardy (Austrian) from (Sardinian,) Piedmont—foot of the mountain—the crossing of which by the Austrians, was the first step in the present war, will be so frequently used now, that it is well to be made familiar with its proper pronounciation, which is Tee-chee-no—the accent on the second syllable.

How to Americanize Cuba.

In a recent address in Georgia, the Hon. Thomas Butler King introduced a fact not generally known to the friends of Cuban annexation in this country; he says that the number of Cuban children now at school in the United States may be estimated at from six to ten thousand. Added to this, Mr. King says that the number of visitors from Cuba to the United States, in the year 1858, was between fifteen and twenty thousand, showing an increase of communication between the Cubans and ourselves. The Savannah Republican says: "We are not certain, after all, if it would not be wisest and best for our Government to await the working out of these silent but effective influences. There is certainly at this time, no pressing need for the possession of Cuba; nor is the necessity likely to arise from any present relations of the States in that quarter of the globe.

Stereographs of Battles.

Dr. Holmes, in his scientific contribution to the last Atlantic Monthly, says: "The next European war will send us stereographs of battles. It is asserted that a bursting shell can be photographed. The time is perhaps at hand when a flash of light, as sudden and brief as that of the lightning which shows a whirling wheel standing stock-still, shall preserve the very instant of the shock of contact of the mighty armies that are even now gathering. The lightning front heaven does actually photograph natural objects on the bodies of those it has just blasted—so we are told by many witnesses. The lightning of clashing sabres and bayonets may be forced to stereotype in a stillness as complete as that of the tumbling tide of Niagara as we see itself pictured."

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

Arrival of the America.—Dates to the 21st May.

War in Italy.

No engagement has taken place. A battle was momentarily expected. The Austrians had ravaged the Sardinian territory occupied by them. The Emperor of Austria was expected at the head of his army. There is an unconfirmed rumor of an alliance of the neutral powers, and a movement on Paris, should Napoleon cross the Ticino.

Arrival of the City of Washington.—Dates to May 25th.

Important Battle in Italy.—The Victory of the Allied Army.—Death of King of Naples.—Garibaldi entered Lombardy and occupied Pavia with 6000 men.—Austrians getting short of Provisions.—Russian Army moving towards Austria.—Fifteen French Men-of-War near Cattaro.—Obstructions in the Adriatic.—French captured 20 Austrian Vessels.—Twenty Thousand Landsmen in British Navy.—

Commercial Intelligence.

LIVERPOOL, May 25.—The sales of Cotton for the three business days since the sailing of the America, amount to 18,000 bales. Prices easier—quotations unchanged. Holders offering stock freely, but no disposition to press sales. Messrs. Clare & Son quote middling Orleans at 6¾ and Middling Uplands at 6 3-16c. The sales of cotton on Saturday were estimated at 5000 bales. The market closed steady.

LONDON, May 25.—The English funds have considerably improved since the sailing of the America. Consols for money closed at 91¾ to 92.

The Battle at Montebello.

LONDON, May 25.—Dispatches from Paris and Vienna announce that an important battle was fought on the 21st instant at Montebello, a small town on the river Aldega, in the territiry of Venice, and belonging to the Lombardo-Venitian kingdom.

It appears that the army corps of Marshal Baraguay d'Hilliers, with the division under Gen. Forey, which embarked from Toulon on the 27th of April, on board the Mediterranean, squadron, proceeded to the Eastern shores of the Adriatic, where the fleet was seen on the 18th instant; crossed over and effected a landing near the mouth of the Aldega.

The Austrian troops, under General Count Stedion, Commander-in-chief of the fourth corps d'armee, at the head of 15,000 men attacked the outposts of Marshal d'Hilliers, but the Austrians were driven back by the division of the French army under General Foray, after a furious combat of four hours duration.

The Austrians retreated to Montebello, pursued by the French, who finally captured the place and remained in possession of it, but did not pursue the Austrians further.

The Austrian force engaged in the battle was 15,000, and the French, according to Austrian accounts, numbered 6,000 men. The loss of the Austrians was 2000 in killed, wounded and prisoners, while that of the French is reported to have been 700.

Five hundred Austrians were taken prisoners and sent to Marseilles, where it is reported they had already arrived.

The Austrian accounts of the engagement differ in details, but confirm the main features as above stated.

Austrian accounts state that besides the 6000 French troops, there was also a regiment of Sardinian cavalry.

A dispatch from Turin gives the substance of an official bulletin of the Sardinian Government, which states that the extreme left wing of the Serdinian army, under General Bulding, had forced a passage over the Sesia, beating back and putting the Austrians to flight.

It is also positively stated that Garibaldi had entered Graven and crossed the Ticino into Lombardy and at last advices was at Povia, with 6000 Italian volunteer soldiers, his object is invading the territory being to encourage revolutionary movements among the people.

The Paris Monitur announces that the French Government adheres to the principle established at the Paris Conference in regard to the abolition of privateering, and has also adopted the principle that a neutral flag covers the enemy's goods.

The Paris Bourse closed firm. The three per cents are quoted at 65.

Various revolutionary movements are reported to be on foot in Lombardy, and an outbreak is daily expected.

The King of Naples is now reported dead, sure, and Francis the Second has ascended the throne and assumed the control of the Government.

Further by the City of Washington.

British Fleet in the Adriatic.—Revolutionary movements in Lombardy.

COMMERCIAL AND MARINE INTELLIGENCE.

LIVERPOOL, May 25th.—A dispatch from Turin reports that a fleet of six English men-of-war had made their appearance in the Adriatic sea.

The reported movement of Garibaldi is not clearly explained, but there are authentic reports that revolutionary movements are on foot in Lombardy, which only need the presence of a leader like Garibaldi to develop them and bring thousands of volunteers to the support of Italian Independence.

War in Italy.

The London Times publishes a report contained in a telegraphic dispatch from Vienna, to the effect that Count Gyulai has informed the Austrian Government that the provisions for the army in Piedmont are beginning to fail, notwithstanding he had nearly exhausted the resources of that portion of the Piedmontese territory occupied by his troops, and that he could not possibly maintain his present position more than fifteen days without supplies from Austria.

Advices from St. Petersburg state that four Russian corps d'armee are marching toward the Austrian frontier.

A dispatch from Turin states that that portion of the French fleet station before Venice had already captured twenty Austrian merchant vessels.

It is reported from Vienna that a fleet of fifteen men-of-war had been seen near Cattaro, on the coast of Dalmotia, on the eastern shore of the Adriatic.

All the various channels of the Adriatic leading to Venice, with one exception, had been blocked up by sunken vessels and ships laden with stones had been placed by the Austrians in readiness to sink, instantaneously, for the purpose of closing up the remaining passage.

The Austrians have also placed guns of very large calibre in a position to command these obstructed channels.

England.

The London Times states that 20,000 landsmen have already volunteered, and have been enrolled in the British navy.

A meeting of the Atlantic Telegraph Company has been called in London, to sanction the new agreement entered into with the British Government, and to issue £600,000 new capital, which has been authorized by the Government.

DOMESTIC.

Later from Havana.

NEW YORK, June 4.—The steamship Columbia, from New Orleans via Havana, arrived at this port this evening.

She left Havana on the 30th ult., and reports the city in a healthy state.

The French vessels of war were in the harbor of Havana awaiting dispatches from their Government, which they expected and received by the Columbia, when they immediately set sail.

Later from Salt Lake.

The Mormons Preparing for War.—Depredations of Indians.—Eight Americans Killed.—Seven Women and Children Burned.—Southern route safe.

ST. LOUIS, June 6.—The Utah mail has arrived. The bad feeling existings between the Mormons and the United States troops were increasing.

The Mormons were organizing military companies and making preparations to resist the execution of the laws and the interference of the United States troops.

Numerous bands of armed Mormons were encamped in the mountains surrounding the city.

Governor Cumming has issued a proclomation, ordering the dispersion of the Mormons and it was anticipated that force would have to be employed in the execution of the order.

The overland California mail arrived on Saturday night.

Accounts from the mining districts are favorable.

The Indians on the route continue their depredations, and small parties of emigrants are attacked, robbed and murdered.

A party of eight Americans, near Honey Lake, were attacked by the Indians and killed. The house of Col. Stevenson at Red Bluff, was set on fire by the Indians, and the wife of Col. Stevenson, and another woman with five children, who were in the house at the time, perished in the flames, being prevented from escaping by the Indians who surrounded the house.

WASHINGTON, June 4.—Advices announcing that the disturbance with the Indians had been settled, and that the Southern mail route was now perfectly safe, have been received.

Later from Arizona—A Band of Regulators Organized.

ST. LOUIS, June 6.—The Arizonia newspaper is filled with accounts of a band of regulators, who have been committing depredations upon the Mexican residents on the frontier and elsewhere. The United States troops stationed at Fort Buchanan have been ordered to the valley.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, June 6, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 4th inst.:

The past week has been a period of very little activity in the market generally, and the rates for Cotton and Tobacco have been unsettled by the tenor of the European advices. Sugar and Molasses, however, have been quite well sustained, and reduced receipts of Western Produce have given the market more firmness, though the operations generally are on a limited scale.

Early on Thursday, the America's advices from Liverpool to 21st ultimo, three days later than those previously to hand, were received, reporting a dull Cotton market at Liverpool, with sales for the week of 38,000 bales, and a general decline of ⅛ to ¼d. is noticed, while the lower grades are said to have fallen off ¼ to ⅛ per pound. The quotations given are for Fair Orleans 7¼d. and for Middling 6¾d. The total stock at Liverpool was 585,000 bales, of which 301,000 bales were American. The advices from Manchester were unfavorable, all descriptions of yarn being dull at slightly lower prices. Breadstuffs, also, were lower. Consols have declined.

COTTON.—We noticed sales for the first three days of the week of 9000 bales, at well-sustained prices for the Middling qualities, but at irregular and somewhat easier rates for the lower grades, advices of ¼d. decline at Liverpool having been received on Monday, by the Bremen steamer New York. On Wednesday some few buyers came forward, and the sales of the day reached about 4000 bales. On Thursday about 2200 bales were taken, all, or nearly all before receipt of the unfavorable advices brought by the America; on account of which intelligence the market was left almost without demand on the following day, the sales being confined to 1500 bales, nearly all by one broker. Thus the sales of the past three days sum up 7700 bales; making a total for the week of 18,700 bales. Total receipts of the week 3674, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,644,051 bales, against 1,519,260 bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 19,172 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 3d inst. 190,665 bales. With respect to prices, there can hardly be said to be any established market. Holders generally resist any marked concessions, but the tendency has been in favor of buyers for some days past, and the sales on Friday indicate a full ¼c. decline.

BENSON'S COMMENTARY. We have a supply of this excellent standard work, in 5 vols., royal 8vo	14 00
[Mr. Benson has always been considered by the Methodists of Great Britain as both learned and original; and as the most reliable in doctrine of all the Armenian Commentators.
DUTIES OF MASTERS. By Rev. H. N. McTyeire, D. D.	50
[Methodist Preachers will, we doubt not, feel it to be a duty to place a copy of this work in the hands of every Southern Planter. It is by a Southern man—the only quarter from which we can consent to be exhorted on that subject. A long experience and acquaintance with both master and servant were prerequisites demanded as absolutely essential to qualify one for writing at all, even but a little, upon this important theme. The writer has satisfied a want, felt by that large proportion of masters who wish to know what they ought to do, that they may do it and discharge their obligations to God and their servants. Not the least valuable part of the book is, that it contains four letters from Bishop Andrew on the religious instruction of Negroes.]
THE GOLDEN CENSER. By Dr. Summers	50
[This most excellent work is a corner-stone for rearing the family altar. Good Christian wives, who have irreligious husbands, can, with the aid of this little book hold family prayers—until the father of the family comes to be, as he ought, the priest of his own house.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

Choosing a Name.—BY MARY LAMB.

I have got a new-born sister;
I was nigh the first that kissed her.
She will shortly be to christen;
And papa has made the offer,
That I shall have the naming of her.

Now I wonder what I could please her—
Charlotte, Julia, or Louisa?
Ann and Mary, they're too common;
Jane's too formal for a woman;
Jane's a prettier name beside;
But we had a Jane that died.
They would say, if I was Rebecca,
That she was a little quaker,
Edith's pretty, but that looks
Better in old English books:
Ellen's left off long ago;
Blanche is out of fashion now.
None that I have named as yet
Are so good as Margaret.
Emily is neat and fine;
What do you think of Caroline?
How I'm puzzled and perplexed
What to choose or think of next.
I am in a little fever
Lest the name that I should give her
Should disgrace her or defame her;
I will leave papa to name her.

The Old French Market.

There is scarcely a stranger who inquiring about New Orleans, has not heard the "old French Market" mentioned as one of its curosities. It is indeed one of the relics of the New Orleans of old times, and attracts attention from the peculiarity, not only of its structure, but of the picture it presents during market hours. There is something there not to be found elsewhere, and to our mind the study of the living panorama to be met at the old market, would give the observer a correct idea of the combined elements that make New Orleans the most incomprehensible city in the States.

Formerly there stood at the foot of St. Ann street a wide market house, built of wood. It was swept down by a terrible hurricane in the year 1812, on the 21st of August, if we mistake not. It was immediately thereafter that the present meat-market was built, to replace the one destroyed; on the same ground, but not in the same position, the wooden market not being like the new one, parallel to the river. The new edifice was constructed of bricks, with the solid pillars, which even to this day retain the compactness of stone, supporting a turreted roof of flat tiles. The terrace was subsequently changed for a slate roof, and the appearance of the market modernized by the addition of a metallic awning supported on slim iron pillars.

It was at that time the only market house in the city; New Orleans had not yet attained her gigantic proportions, and it was hardly over a year since the forts that guard the new corner of Customhouse and Rampart streets, and that of Esplanade and Rampart streets, had been pulled down. For New Orleans was once a fortified city, and Rampart street had a significant name. The meat market then, was the only market, and vegetables and fruit were sold by the negro venders outside of the market, under the shade of the orange trees, that formed a grove extending to the foot of Toulouse street; whilst the Spanish boatmen had their skiffs and pirogues moored alongside the bank, shaded by a double row of willow, and there sold their fish, shrimps and oysters. In those times, New Orleans could not boast of the forest of masts now lining her miles of wharves; hundreds of noble steamboats did not stem the current of the Mississippi, the magnetic telegraph had not yet put us almost within speaking distance of the Old World, and the place where we now sit writing, was renowned for the abundance of snipe and other swamp birds there to be found.

The vegetable market at the foot of St. Philip street, was built in the year 1824 to meet the exigencies of the growing population. The modern fruit market situated between the two other named, was built in our time, only a few years ago.

The old markets have remained a speciality, reminding one partly of the Halles of Paris, although differing in many features, owing to the characteristic differences in the population. About midnight the markets begin to show signs of life; the coffee tables are decorated with their array of cups of steaming Mocha, and visited by many for business or amusement; then the dull sound of cart wheels is heard, and the butchers and vegetable venders bring their quota of the daily food of New Orleans. The noise of the hammer and the cleaver is heard as beefsteaks, chops and ribs are separated and hung up temptingly, while pyramids of vegetables, mountains of game, and cart loads of fish are spread out upon the stalls of the other markets. Daylight appears and the crowd of visitors keeps increasing; servants with their baskets, gentlemen enjoying an early smoke, or desirous of giving personal attention to the outlay for dinner; fine ladies out for an early walk; and good housewives who do their own marketing. The dense crowd keeps moving in a double human stream between the two markets, some going down and the others coming up. By this time the wide flag stone path which leads with a curve from the end of the meat market to the head of the vegetable and fruit markets, is lined on both sides by pedlars and dealers of every imaginable kind. Here the Italian, with his basket of eggs; there the Yankee with a table covered with cakes of soap, trinkets and nick nacks; squatted on this side, the Indian squaw looks calm and indifferent with the bunches of sassafras roots, aromatic plants from the forest, and the small bag of gombo powder spread out on the ground before her; a little further, the plantation negro will offer you honey, palmetto brooms and young chickens; on this side, numerous cages contain hundreds of birds chirruping, whistling, fluttering alongside of the tame rabbits, Guinea pigs, and choice Shanghai or Bantam fowls. The Frenchman solicits your attention to his cheap, fine goods, while you are startled by the hoarse voice of the Spanish oysterman crying, "salt oysters."

You move as best you may, jostled pushed or pressed, not walking in any particular direction, but carried away by the living torrent, bewildered, deafened by the noise, but highly enjoying the sight. As you approach the street at the head of the vegetable garden, you come to the flower department. Trees, shrubs, plants of every kind deluge their perfumes, and gladden the eye with their beautiful colors. You can buy a whole garden there, that will make an Eden of your paved yard; or, if more modest in your aspiration, you can buy a sweet marjolaie, or pretty rose bush in its earthen pot to put in your window, or a beautiful bouquet to ornament your mantel piece. In the area of these three blocks you will find most of the products of the earth, and fabrics of human skill.

Here it is that old friends meet; that the familiar diet that is indulged in; that you learn the news, the thousand little incidents of private life; where you discover the pathetic secret of the hidden domestic drama, or the laughable scenes of the social comedy. We know quite a number of old gentlemen who have never failed to pass an hour in the market daily, for the last forty or fifty years; now and then one of them disappears, swept away by nature's inevitable decree; but the others still repair daily to their haunt, venerable relics of a time past. They have seen many things; they can tell many a tale about our good city, and from them we have obtained the glimpse of the history of the old French Market, which we have laid before our readers, perhaps too lengthily.—Picayune.

A Great Bridge.

The Victoria, Canada, bridge, which is now building over the St. Lawrence river by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, it is stated, is, without exception, the greatest work of the kind in the world. For gigantic proportions and vast length and strength there is nothing to compare with it in ancient or modern times. The entire bridge, with its approaches, is only about sixty yards short of two miles. It is five times longer than the Britannia bridge across the Menai Straits, seven-and-a half times longer than Waterloo bridge, and more than ten times longer than the new Chelsea bridge across the Thames! The Victoria has not less than 24 spans of 242 feet each and one great central span—itself an immense bridge—of 330 feet. The road is carried within iron tubes 60 feet above the level of the St. Lawrence, which runs beneath at a speed of about 10 miles an hour, and in winter brings down the ice of some 2000 miles of lake and upper rivers, with their numerous tributaries. The weight of iron in the tubes will be upwards of 10,000 tons supported on massive stone piers, each of solid masonry.

Died from Grief.

Our English papers state that recently a boy, eight years old, was committed for the theft of a purse containing a sovereign, from the tail of a cart of an old woman, who had given him a ride. Bail was refused and the lad was sent to jail. The father, on parting with the child took the matter so deeply to heart that he complained immediately thereafter of having received a sudden shock at his heart—as if shot. Although in good health at the time, and a robust and hearty man, he never again looked up. A deep-seated melancholy took possession of him; he was obliged to give up work, and after a few days was confined to his bed. He gradually grew worse, and on the day on which his child was to be tried, he breathed his last. The surgeon who attended him says he died of a broken heart. The boy was discharged.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

THE INFLUENCE OF SONG.

The mighty power which music exerts in influencing the hearts and actions of men, has been well known in every age. The greatest general of Europe, whose achievements have been so long the wonder of the world, was wont to bestow the greatest care in the selection of tunes for his armies. It is related that in his perilous march across the Alps, when most terrific obstacles opposed his course, he would order the bugle notes to peal forth their choicest strain, and like an electric current a corresponding spirit flashed throughout the entire line of his worn-out soldiery, nerving them to efforts seemingly beyond the power of mortals. Sometimes, however, an appaling danger, yawning beneath their very feet, would cause a sudden halt, and make even the stoutest hearts quail before the apparently sure destruction. Then the leader would command the "charge to battle" to be thundered forth by all the army, and that sound never failed to inspire them with a fire of daring which impelled them onward, even "into the jaws of death."

But far more lovely seems the sway of music when we find it exercised in a more gentle, kindly way. Who has not, many times in life, felt his hardened heart grow light again under the sweet influence of some loved song of "auld lang syne?" Who has not felt the stormy waves of evil in his soul grow calm and still, as he listened to the peaceful words of some sweet hymn within the courts of Zion?

Such impressions refine and purify the nature, and the more carefully they are enitivated, the more beautiful will the character become. A clergyman, whose daughters were remarkable for their most happy and amiable dispositions, was once asked the secret of his training. He replied, "When any thing occurs to disturb their tempers, I say to them, Sing; and when I hear them speak evil of any one, I call them to sing to me; and thus they have sung away all causes of discontent, and every disposition to scandal." Most happy would it be for society if all other daughters were similarly educated.

A VICTIM OF JEALOUSY.

Strolling in the Second District the other day, we stopped to look at an old lady whose appearence had so much oddity about it that people stopped and turned around, whilst little urchins followed her in high glee and played all kinds of mischievous pranks. Her faded and ragged dress was of some showy pattern, and its skirts expanded over a wide set of hoops. A mantilla, none the better for wear, was thrown in a coquettish manner over her shoulders; a strange looking bennet, trimmed with bright flowers and brighter ribbons, covored her gray locks, the inside being encircled with a garland of roses, which contrasted sadly with her wan features. She held a dilapidated fan and boquet, and alternately smelt the one and used dexterously the other, as she tripped along with a fantastic step, smiling placidly upon the crowd and giving a triumphant toss of the head whenever she mistook the stare of wonder of the bystanders for looks of admiration.

Our curiosity was roused by this singular being, and we could have no rest until we found ont who she was, and what mystery existed in all this eccentricity. Our inquiries were at last successful, and one, who had known her, told us the following story: Julia C. was once considered quite a belle. She was courted and married for love. After a few short years of happiness her fickle husband got tired of her, and sought another's love. The neglect with which her husband treated her acted fearfully upon her, and one day, when she had undeniable proof of his guilt, her mind, weakened by ceaseless anxiety, could not stand the shock, and she became mad. Her insanity was of a gentle and touching nature; it was simply the oblivion of her years of married life. She believed herself again the young girl, admired and beloved. She has grown prematurely old, and the delusion still remains. She expects her lover to come soon and fix the day for her unptials. She bestows every care upon her toilet, adorning her person with all the ludicrous notions of madness. She likes to be admired, but she loves only him—him, her first and accepted lover. Poor Julia!

And the husband? The husband, reader, he is in Paris, where he went with his paramour, when his wife became insane. He afterwards abandoned the frail fair one also, and lives the life of a man of fashion—an antiquated beau and worn out old roue—lavishing his gold upon the syrens of the great French capital. [Picayune.

THE CENTURY OF WOMEN.

An ancient German legend, quoted by Florence Nightingale, in her admirable account of the Kaiserwerth Hospital for Nurses, long years before the Crimean war had tried her noble nature and made her name immortal, speaks of the nineteenth century as the destined "Century of Woman." In this happy age, womanhood was to rule the world, and woman setting herself to man, "like perfect music unto nohle words," was to subdue all the discords of earth. Up to this time the prophecy has received many confirmations. Never before has woman played so great a part for good and ill in the world's affairs as during the last fifty years. Our prisons and our poor bless the name of Miss Fry and Miss Dix, with their myriad sisters of Mercy. A woman endears monarchy to the rising republicanism of Great Britain by her virtues and her wisdom. Three European thrones have been filled within the century by women. "Women's rights" have invaded the courts of law, the schools of medicine, the sacred desk itself. We are indeed apparently upon the very verge of a general gynocracy in authorship and in actual life.—New York Times.

A FAITHFUL WIFE.

The Marechal de Mouchy having been conducted a prisoner to the Luxemburg, had scarcely arrived there when his wife entered the prison. The jailor observed to her that the order for the Marechal's arrest made no mention of her. She answered with mingled gaiety and sweetness, "Since my husband is called for, I am also called.

When he was carried before the Revolutionary Tribunal, he was still attended by his wife. The Public Accuser having informed Madame de Mouchy that she was not called upon to appear, she replied, "When my husband is called for, I am also called."

In a word, when the fatal sentence of death was pronounced upon the Marechal, his faithful wife ascended the cart with him; and when the executioner objected, because she was not condemned to die, she answered, "Since sentence is passed upon my husband, it is passed upon me also."

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

THE HON. THOMAS H. DIXON, a native of North Carolina, but for over twenty-five years a citizen of Noxubee county, Mississippi, died near Brooksville, on the 10th May, in his forty-ninth year. For twenty years a member of the Methodist church, he died as he had lived, in the faith. During an illness of two weeks, accompanied by much suffering, there was an failure in his confidence in God—not for a moment one doubt of his acceptance. Once, when under the influence of opiates, he said he could not think nor reason; but he could and did believe in Jesus. Judge Dixon was a large-hearted man in all things involving the interests of the church. He thought of her welfare, he prayed and labored to promote her prosperity in all her enterprises. Especially was his heart enlisted in the Tract cause. Annually his contribution, unsolicited by an agent, was forwarded to those having charge of this interest. He was the first man whom the writer of this notice heard speak of endowing the Publishing-house. And, before a line had been published on this subject he had written an article—which he withheld for deliberation, until the subject was introduced to the public by, as he judged, other hands. He hailed with eager delight every plan which looked to the attainment of this end. As class-leader and steward, few were equally faithful, efficient and constant in duty. God blessed him with the richest of all blessings—a religious household. His children, trained from infancy, were converted as they reached the years of accountability—early in life. One, a sketch of whose death is in "Gathered Flowrets," died in peace in her tenth year, with evidences of maturity in Christian experience rarely found in one so young. The church militant loses one of her most devoted servants—he has taken his place in the church of God, above. We who remain, comfort ourselves with the thought—"Those which sleep in Jesus, God will also bring with Him."

T. J. KOGER.

SISTER ELIZABETH G. BARNETT has gone to the rest that remains for the people of God. She was born in Baltimore, Maryland, January 18, 1803; and born again at Infield's campground, near Corydon, Indiana, August 1820. She died at Napoleonville, Louisiana, at the home of her son-in-law, Rev. N. A. Cravens. She trained her family for God, and was permitted to see them all raised, educated and prepared to act a successful part on the stage of life; and all, or nearly all, members of the methodist Episcopal Church South—and two of her sons a son-in-law are Itinerants in the Louisiene Conference—preaching the gospel that was the stay of her life, and her all-sufficient support in death. She was a woman of a meek and quiet spirit, adorning by a good life, the doctrine of God our Savior. Though her closing sufferings were considerable and painful she was resigned, and expressed not one doubt of her acceptance with God. But a little before she passed away, she said to the loved ones about her, "Sing! O, sing to me of heaven!" Thus God's saints live, a life of faith and love; and die, a death of holy triumph! Their memory is blessed, and, like the sun going down in a cloudless sky, they leave a glory behind to tell how they went and whither they are gone. She has for many years been a faithful member of our Israel—in the Carondolet-street charge. Many will mourn her loss, but sorrow not as those who have no hope. Her Pastor,

J. B. WALKER.

UNCLE JACK, colored servant of Mrs. N. Slaton, aged about ninety years, died 11th March, 1859, in Antauga county, Alabama, after a protracted illness. The grave has closed over but few better men than Uncle Jack. After a long terrestrial pilgrimage his sun set behind an unclouded sky, with a lucid mind, and in the enjoyment of the Christinn's brightest hope. Adorned by all the Christian virtues, he left behind him a spotless character. From his earliest youth he was strictly moral, and as a Christian his conduct was truly exemplary. As a servant he was honest and faithful. His kind mistress, to whom he was very much attached, had the most implicit confidence in his fidelity and piety; and feels that, in his death, she has lost one of her best friends. She and her children feel assured that though Uncle Jack has passed away from the shadowy scenes of time, and has ceased to worship with the Methodist Episcopal church on earth, of which he was a very zealous member—he has gone up and joined the shining choirs of the Great Church Triumphant; and is now with his beloved master, who has gone before him, engaged in singing the song of "Moses and the Lamb." Blessed old servant! humble as was his condition here, eternity only can discover the silent but potent influence of his example and precepts. C. S. G. DOSTER.

TRUTH CONVINCIVENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy, of a letter received by us from A. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to these in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communication. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing unjustly sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday,) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning, following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses in quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the record three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is rubbing about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited, let, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

MARION SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

The Secretary of the Marion Sunday-school and Sunday-school Missionary Societies of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, would respectfully report:

That since the rendition of his last report, the condition and management of the two Societies have been such as to warrant the assertion that both now rest upon permanent bases. We close, to-night, the fourth year of successful experiment, and enter upon the fifth, buoyant with hope and confident of a more enlarged success than has hitherto crowned our efforts. A work like ours cannot but prosper so long as good remains to be performed, and an over-ruling providence directeth all things aright.

During the year, the close of which we commemorate to-night, both of the Societies above named, have manifested many and encouraging signs of improvement, and of their capacity for producing good results. The organization of each is more thorough at the present, than it has ever been at any former time. In our Sunday-school we have one hundred and forty scholars, whose attendance upon the weekly assembling of the school have been more punctual as well as more regular than heretofore. The teachers seem to manifest an increasing regard for the instruction and welfare of the pupils entrusted to their charge; while on the other hand, the pupils are evidently more zealous, studious, and careful to please, than is often the case where so many are assembled.

As it may not be uninteresting, and as I am convinced that it will prove novel to a great many now present, I propose to give a brief summary of the leading features of our system, and of the method of management and control of the Societies herein before mentioned.

The Sunday-school Society is governed by a constitution, to which is annexed a set of by-laws, alterable, amendable or suspensible, by a two-thirds vote of the constitutionally authorized voters. These voters are the officers and teachers of the School, who meet monthly and consult and provide for the better and more perfect management and administration of the affairs of the school. Its system has been adopted which, upon trial, fails to realize the expectations in which it had its origin, or, if experience proves the necessity of inaugurating any new method or policy, these Monthly (or Teachers') meetings, as they are termed, take into consideration the expediency of a change to suit the circumstances of the case.

And if such proposed change meets the approval of the requisite number of those in attendance, it is adopted and engrafted upon the constitution and by-laws. Hence, it follows, that ours is a progressive system—ever aiming at, and by gradual stages approaching, perfection.

One of the peculiarities of our system of Sunday-school administration is, the practice of reporting publicly at the close of each lesson—the attendance, scholarship, and conduct, of each class in the school. Just before the exercises of the day draw to a close, the Superintendent takes his stand in front of the entire school, and calls upon each and every teacher for the report of his or her class. As a general thing, such report is made very comprehensive in its terms—including merely the general or average scholarship and deportment of the entire class, and without specifying individual merits or inferiority. But in cases, where any member of the class distinguishes himself by a more than ordinarily perfect lesson, it is not uncommon for such scholar's name to be approvingly mentioned, by way of encouraging him and stimulating others to renewed and severer application. By reason of this plan of procedure, it very seldom happens that we hear a scholar reported for bad scholarship, and never for ill-conduct. No boy or girl of correct feeling is very emulous for a bad report, and as the only means of avoiding such report consists in good conduct and well-considered lessons, it follows, as an almost inevitable natural consequence, that we have very few who are not excellent scholars. Indeed the pupils of this school, generally, so far as their instructions have extended, are much better versed in Biblical lore than any similar number within my knowledge anywhere else to be found. The only drawback of which I am aware to the complete success of this system of weekly reports is, the seeming indifference on the part of parents in regard to the matter. During the fifty-two weeks which have elapsed since my last report was rendered in, I am confident there have not been exceeding three attendances at Sunday-school on the part of the parents of the children who are taught therein, if I except one or two who chanced to be officers of the school. And although this argues a great degree of confidence in the ability and integrity of the instructors of their children, yet with all due deference I must say, that I do not regard such confidence, however well-placed it may be, as affording a sufficient, nay, not even a reasonable excuse, for parental neglect; because, the more consciousness that a father's or mother's fond, proud eye is upon him, will awaken and enliven the dormant energies of the very dullest of boys. Even those who are callous with regard to the good or evil opinions of their school mates, cannot always brook the feelings and opinions of the parents whom they love and honor. Example speaks louder than precept, and if the father or mother fails or refuses to attend the Sabbath-school, the child will soon cease to regard his own attendance as a matter of any great importance.

Under ordinary circumstances I should not have deemed myself in duty bound to advert to the foregoing facts, last mentioned; but, by a special vote of our "teachers' meeting," I am required to render "a faithful report;" and, I should consider that I had failed to do so, had I passed that matter over in silence.

Another of the peculiarities of our system of Sunday-school government is, the mode we adopt of choosing teachers. When, from any cause, a vacancy has occurred, a committee appointed for that purpose, report the name of some person in all respects qualified to fill such vacancy. If no objection is urged either to his competency or fitness for a station so important and responsible, the vote of the assembly or meeting is taken upon the question of his admittance. If admitted, he enters at once, and without further ceremony upon the duties of his office. Hence, no one is permitted to be an instructor of the young in our Sabbath-school, who cannot for himself, at any and all times and under all circumstances, procure the unanimous endorsement of his fellow-teachers.

At each of the meetings of the officers and teachers of the school, herein before mentioned, a committee is appointed to act during the ensuing month, whose duty it is made to search out such children as attend no Sabbath-school, and provide them with books and classes in ours.

With the foregoing general outline of the practical portion and operation of the Sunday-school Society, I must in a great measure connect the same parts of the Sunday-school Missionary Society. This is necessary, because the two are composed of nearly the same material; are governed by the same or similar laws; meet at the same time, and in conjunction with each other; the laws of each are subject, in like manner, to changes, modifications, amendments or repeals; and, because, to set forth the minutiæ of the plan and workings of the latter would be but to repeat a great portion of what I have already said with regard to the former.

If I were required to define the Sunday-school Missionary Society—not the mere meaning of the term alone, but the society itself, its aims and objects—I should say that it was the Sunday-school, putting forth its arm and strength for the accomplishment of general and universal good. The only material difference between the two societies consists in the fact that whilst the one is dispensing its charity at home, the other seeks to dispense charity abroad. For the purpose of accomplishing the latter purpose, money is necessary. Hence, the main energies of the Missionary Society are directed to the intermediate means and appliances by which it is surrounded. It has no Missionary to send abroad, but it has the means of aiding, in some degree, those who are already abroad; and the determination of each member is or ought to be to use those means as the poor widow of Scripture did her mite.

This Society is composed of the same members who compose the Sunday-school Society, with a sort of supernumerary addition of one manager from each class in the school. It is made the duty of these managers to collect the annual dues of each member of their respective classes, and their privilege to collect as much from other sources as they may or can procure. And, in order to produce competition and stimulate effort in this matter, the by-laws of the society provides that at each annual celebration (such as the present) two prizes shall be awarded—one each, to the most successful male and female collector or manager, as they are termed. By a subsequent amendment, it was further provided that, a prize should be awarded to each manager who should succeed in collecting the sum of twenty dollars or more, regardless of the number which might so succeed. No change, however, was effected by this amendment, touching the rendition of the capital or highest prizes, which remain to be awarded as had thitherto been provided—that is, to him and her who collect most in their respective departments. If no manager succeeds in collecting more than ten dollars, the by-laws declare that no prize shall be awarded. Hence, in order to secure a prize it is absolutely necessary that the candidate therefor, should collect more than the sum of ten dollars. As has been shown you by the report of the Treasurer of the Sunday-school Missionary Society, the amount thus collected by the different managers exceeds the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars. And although this may be a very small sum when taken by itself, it is nevertheless an important constituent of a much greater. If the five hundred Sabbath-schools of Alabama, which are fully and abundantly able to do so, were to follow the example set them by ours, and furnish each an equal amount, we should then have the respectable sum of seventy-five thousand dollars contributed by the children of the Church for the enlightenment and salvation of the benighted and heathen men of the world.

Have any of you, who object to the meagreness of the sum collected, contributed in any manner to make it larger? If not, you have no ground for complaint; and if you have, your only ground of quarrel should be that your contribution was not greater. Or, have you thought of the amount of good which even $150, when rightly applied, will accomplish? Take the computation above made, and apply judiciously the $75,000 which would then be obtained. You will find that sum amply sufficient to maintain seventy-five missionaries three or four years in any part of the globe where missionary labor is required. Now, suppose that these men should succeed in convincing and converting only twenty souls each during the entire "three or four years" ministry; here then we should have one thousand and five hundred souls saved at the nominal average of fifty dollars each. Think of that! Where else could these Sunday-schools invest their little capital to such overwhelming advantage? How else could they manage to lay up, at a cost so insignificant, such precious treasure in Heaven? Then be not alarmed, nor presume to think your gift wasted. The money of these "little ones" has not been cast away. It is loaned to the Lord, and in his own good time he will abundantly repay.

Respectfully Submitted.

M. Mortimer Cooke, Secretary.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

"THE PULPIT."

"Arise, go unto Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee." Jonah iii 2.

Mr. Editor:—This passage of Holy writ came forcibly to my mind, while reading Dr. Lee's article on the "Pulpit," in the late Quarterly Review.

A wonderful production, that, of the Doctor! "Highly suggestive," says Dr. Summers, "in the direction that we want popular ministers; but their popularity must grow out of their pastoral fidelity and their varied attainments, qualifying them so to present the great principles of Christianity as to secure for them a general regard." That is to say, that the offence of the cross must be abated to the extent that we are, as a Church, henceforth to make and employ such a ministry as will draw upon us (our Church) "a general regard." For surely these learned brethren do not wish our ministers by their varied attainments, to draw upon themselves a general popular regard! There is no mistaking Dr Lee's intent in this article, for it is a long, loud, unfaltering, fault-finding with the old order of things—Wesley and all his sons down to the present generation—and an endeavor to announce himself as the avant-courier of a better day coming.

I must do Dr. Summers the justice to say, that he calls attention in his editorial paragraph to the fact, that "an opposite view is advocated by Drs. Winans and Ralston," and he might have added, by ninety-five hundredths of the Methodist clergy, whether living or dead. In this country majorities rule; but I am willing to allow that sometimes minorities may be right; so let Dr. Lee and all his sympathizers have an open field and a fair fight. Solomon says, "All the ways of a man are clean in his own eyes;" and whoever reads Dr. Lee's article on the "Pulpit," cannot fail to see that he is on remarkably fine terms with his own ways, thoughts, and deductions. How much self-esteem a man may have and not be a sinner thereby, I have never been able to determine; but for the sake of myself and all such as Dr. Lee, I hope the Lord will look upon us with great allowance. He approaches and travels through this grave question with the non chalant air of an argus-eyed Brogdinag, that had light on all sides; and by the radiant good humor of his face seems to say, "keep out of my way, and I will not hurt you." But to keep out of the way is the question; for if Dr. Lee can rake over the ashes of the venerable dead as he has done, in the spirit and manner with which he speaks of Wesley and the buried generation of the Methodist preachers, I fear, we living Lilliputs will have to hide our diminished heads, until this storm of invective against Wesley and the Fathers be overpast. Generous reader! I know Dr. Lee; he is a good man, but was in one of his ways when he wrote for the Quarterly, and got a-going and could not stop. You remember that Aaron justified himself in the matter of making the golden calf; in that, he just threw the jewel into the fire, and the calf made itself. So when the Doctor went out begging of theological training-schools from Romanists, Lutherans, Churchmen, Presbyterians, etc., in order to make an idol for a few complaining fastidious Methodists, it would come, and in the form it did; and being done, I guess he effects to believe it is well done. But it is worth while to attempt to take the spell from off his mental vision, that he may see once more with the clear-sightedness of a Methodist preacher. Now for the benefit of those who do not read the Quarterly, and in justice to the good brother whose production I now propose to review, extracts will be made and commented on, as I shall have light and liberty. He says:

"The first occupants of the pulpit were Divinely commissioned and Divinely inspired. Inspiration substituted study and supplied knowledge. They had but to open their mouths—the right words, Divinely furnished, were in place ready to proceed on their mission to the hearer, guided to his heart by the Spirit of truth. Under such influences the word had free course, and was glorified.

"But their successors are not so guided and sustained. The commission remains; its inspired accompaniments (save that the Holy Ghost still accompanies the faithful preaching of the word, and makes it quick and powerful) are withdrawn. Reflection substitutes inspiration; knowledge of the truth, gained by careful study, supplies thought; thought generates words; "and words that man's wisdom teacheth," uttered in prayerful dependance upon the spiritual aid promised as a living presence to the preachers, is the residuum of the original deposit. What remains to us may not be lightly esteemed, and must not be neglected. We are neither destitute nor helpless. God, and Christ, and the Holy Spirit, remain. They are for us and with us. Truth, the word that is settled in heaven, that abideth forever, whose entrance giveth light, and stirs the pulse of a new life in those who are dead in trespasses and sin, is left. It is a sword, two-edged and sharp—it is ours. Conscience, hope, fear, heaven, hell remain. These are the soul's harp-strings. It is ours to trill its chords, and evoke music that will thrill with higher rapture the notes of the new song. These remain to us. They are mighty, through God, and they are ours. Love, too, the love of the Spirit is ours. It is an unction, if not an inspiration. He is not weak whose heart reposes on, and draws strength from these sources of power."

Exactly so! But whose heart so reposes on, and draws strength? The humble christian man—"called of God as was Aaron," or he who is fresh from the Theological training-school, flushed and burdened with the "words that man's wisdom teacheth?" Or to meet the question fairly, can no one but an educated man, such as I suppose Dr. Lee to be, "draw strength from these sources of power?" But we must not pass away from this ponderous extract without an attempt to analyze it, so that its real worth may appear. In it is an attempt to draw a distinct line between an inspired and an uninspired preacher of the gospel; and the only difference he makes is, that the first occupants of the "Pulpit" were Divinely inspired, and the second occupants are not. All this is cheerfully conceded, because revealed; but it is not revealed that "study" is the substitute for inspiration. Nevertheless, Dr. Lee says so; upon what authority he does not tell us. But even grant him this, can he tell us precisely when and with whom this inspiration ended, and with whom the substitute obtained, as the new order of things in the matter of the propagation of the gospel of peace? It seems to me, that in order to avail himself of some show of scriptural proof for his theory, he must confine the inspiration to the twelve Apostles and St. Paul; and the substituted power commences with Apollos Barnabas, Timothy, Titus, etc., etc. For he can show that the first named did receive private instructions from Aquila and Priscilla—they "expounding unto him the way of God more perfectly." (I wonder if the good brother and sister could, if alive now, get from any of our Methodist Colleges, the "Chair of Biblical Literature?") And, moreover, he can show that Paul wrote to Timothy, to "give attendance to reading and to study, to show himself approved," etc. Whether it was a "horn book," put in his hand to read and study, we are not informed. But to sum up, as the lawyers say—if the distinction I have made for Dr. Lee, as to when and who, be correct; then all he has written against Mr. Wesley and the leaders of the Methodist movement, until the present day, applies with equal force of condemnation against the College of Apostles, for failing to found a "training-school," for evangelists, and especially so after the conversion of the learned Paul.

These Apostles, instead of sending Barnabas to Antioch, Timothy to Ephesus, Titus to Crete, and Crescens to Galatia, should have stopped these young men in College at Jerusalem, until they were well instructed in the "words that man's wisdom teacheth." The Apostles failed to found any such seminary for the education of young preachers; and I have never met with any man, nor read of one, who had the effrontery to say of the Primitive Church, the Church of the first and second centuries, as the Doctor has said of our Church—"Yet one thing it lacks." So the children of Israel thought in the days of Samuel that they lacked one thing, and that was a King. The God of Abraham did not think so; and, reverently, I am of the opinion that the God of Paul and Wesley, does not agree at all with Dr. Lee.

But still to meet the matter in debate fairly, let us grant that we have, as a Church and Ministry, all the help Divine that the Apostles had, except inspiration, and that "study" is the substitute; then the question arises, study what? Study when? "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." Herein the paramount motive to study is to please God! The highest result of this study is, to rightly divide the word of truth; then by an easy and natural induction, we learn precisely what we have to study, viz. "the word of truth," the Holy Scriptures. The question then narrows down to this; can or cannot these Scriptures be studied and preached successfully, without the intervention of these "training-schools?" I think so, but Dr. Lee thinks differently, for he is in extacies at the good days that are coming when the Church will have these schools, and the low of the Church will compel a tarrying in these scholastic shades for a season, at least; after which, only, can the harness be buckled on, or the trumpet blown in Zion. And in all this, the good brother seems as confident and earnest as if he had a revelation from Heaven, saying to the Church, you must not delay to establish these training-schools, or the glory is forever departed! That I do not misrepresent, nor overstate, behold the following:

"The law of Moses required the oil for the Sanctuary to be well beaten, thoroughly strained, and carefully prepared in all respects. The law of the Pulpit requires equal care and labor in the preparation of sermons. The best sermon is the one best prepared!"

In the Leviticus, xxiv. 2., we have this—"Command the children of Israel, that they bring unto thee pure oil-olive, beaten, for the lights." Not a word about "straining and thorough preparation." But let all that pass. Where does the Doctor find that law of the Pulpit? Not, I am sure, in Moses and the Prophets, nor Jesus and the Apostles, in the sense he must be understood. No such law exists. Moreover, in my simplicity, I have always been of the opinion that that was the best sermon which did the most good; just as that is the mightiest storm that tears down the most trees; and it seems to me, before this saying of the Doctor can find acceptance as a universal axiom, he must define better than he has done what a sermon is, and all the sources helps and signs of preparation. Then only can we try the temper, strength and edge of these Damascus blades and decide knowingly upon their merits. If by the best prepared sermons, the Doctor had meant the one in which there was the richest Scriptural view of God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, then we would agree, but when its riches and grandeur are to be found in the abounding and arranging of "words that man's wisdom teacheth," then I beg to be excused.

I must here intermit my regard for and attentions to Dr. Lee's production. Another day, more anon.

Tuskegee, June 1st 1859. F. G. Francson.

P. S. A certain Mr. Kennedy of East Tennessee, poured forth in the Nashville Advocate numbers to the amount of a half dozen or more, in which he proved to his own satisfaction, that the Christian Church did begin in the third century to establish Theological schools, and that henceforth this was the order of things until the Reformation. And then the Protestants of every nation and sect had them until the days of Wesley. And his labored conclusion is, that the Methodists must have them too. Now if the truth of history warrants his facts, the same history shows that simultaneous with these human machines for preacher making, heresies, backslidings and all possible errors of irreligion, have crept into the Church to work its disgrace and ruin. In other words these schools have never preserved either the purity of doctrine, or the morals of the Church. Then, Close sheltered by his bleeding side." F. G. F.

MEMPHIS, THE BLUFF CITY.

May 28, 1859.

Tacly, this might be called the Bluff City—so prominent, picturesque, and beautiful, do these elevations appear. They remind me of the ruins of Imperial Rome upon the Pulastine hills, where the palaces of the Cæsars lie buried in a mass of broken walls overgrown with trees and shrubs, which have taken root upon their ruined arches and fallen fanes. These Bluffs of clay have the appearance of natural rock; and, at a little distance, fancy can finish the picture and transfer to the mind all the resemblance of art—by the cavities washed by the rains into forms of pinnacles, arches and crumbling towers, with trees taking root in their crevices, formed by the hand of time, which triumphs over the works of art, and wreathes the mouldering tomb. The Bluffs are an ornament to the city, and form one of its most striking features of natural beauty, attracting the eye of the stranger and leaving a lasting impression on his mind.

The name of Memphis has sublime associations with the Oriental world, upon which my eye lately rested. The old city of Egypt—situated among its groves of palms and lofty pyramids, obelisks and tombs, but now desolate—the sands of the desert form its walls, and the winds sweep over it in dying cadence. A few idolatrous relics of monumental grandeur tell where it once stood in its days of earthly glory.

This Memphis, in our new world, has a different destiny. Its pyramids of cotton bales float down our American Nile, and add to its wealth and prosperity which is everywhere seen—in its elegant and beautiful warehouses, splendid buildings with balconies of iron network, displaying the taste and refinement of a city which opens its mart of commerce to the world, on this mighty river. In the fall, the great squares were filled with cotton bales, piles upon piles; and, although they added to its prosperity and wealth, detracted from its beauty, in shading the prospects of its beautiful bluffs, now so conspicuous. But the fragments scattered about tell where it has been laid, and borne off on our American Nile—to which the Mississippi bears some resemblance in the present great over-flow, which has spread desolation upon all its borders. From New Orleans, up, it looked like a world of waters. But from Natchez to Memphis the deluge seemed to be of greater extent. Plantation after plantation was covered—the houses and cabins appeared as if standing in the middle of the river; the cattle, feeding on little strips of land—like islands, with a scanty herbage for subsistence. The beautiful little city of Napoleon, nestled among green trees, looked like a miniature Venice, where the shadows of its trees which lined its walks were reflected in its flood. The prospects of the planter in the Mississippi valley is truly blighted, and the future shrouded in gloom.

But there is a God in the valley as well as among the hills; and the calculations of man, in all his enterprises, is limited by his power.

How many are there who talk of earthly prospects with any reference to Him, upon whom they entirely depend? Is it not—how many hogsheads of sugar, how many bales of cotton shall we make? as if all wisdom, power and might, lay within themselves. With all the judgments of God how few learn righteousness! but, like Pharoah of old, harden their hearts, under all the severe dispensations which are intended for man's improvement and eternal happiness.

A Funeral.—Just as we landed a death-march fell upon our ear, in mournful cadence, and a long procession of the fire companies met our sight, who had borne a brother to the grave. The pensive strain called forth a responsive note in our hearts, where the chords vibrate at the touch of sorrow—so long tuned to the arrows of death. The companies, in scarlet, blue and green, with mourning badges and a band of music, presented a beautiful and impressive appearance.

LETTER FROM EAST TEXAS.

Mr. Editor: For some time past, I have been thinking I would give you some outlines of my observations on a few subjects that may be interesting to some of your readers. If all your readers were well acquainted with the geographical limits of East Texas Conference, I need say nothing on this subject. To have a correct knowledge, it is necessary to have the last map of Texas. Look, then, for the mouth of Trinity river—follow its meanderings, bearing a little west of north—having its source not far from Red River—latitude, 33½, and longitude, 98—with said river to longitude 94, then south, by line, till the line strikes Sabine river—thence, with said stream, to the Gulf.

This is the territory embraced in East Texas Conference.—I am not posted as regards the strength of the various religious denominations, with the exception of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Perhaps, in numbers, this branch of the Church is larger than all other denominations. Some twenty years ago the Cumberland Presbyterian preachers were men who traveled, holding meetings after the fashion of the Methodists—some of their preachers itinerating through the country. This system was kept up more or less till a few years since. In all the bounds, of my knowledge, I know not one, nor have heard of one that is traveling regularly and preaching. This denomination has never done much if anything, in organizing societies in the coast counties, to my knowledge: indeed, there have been but comparatively few societies formed south of the Sun Antonio road. Now look at your map—see what a vast territory. Take the counties through which the "old King's highway" runs, and I think there has not been one hundred members belonging to this church organization. Why have they neglected this portion?

There are some eight or ten counties, in which I do not know of one society. In some counties where they have flourished, they had pretty strong neighborhood churches—they have comparatively none now. May I not modestly ask why this declension? I could name several, where they once had flourishing societies, but now they have none—nor any preacher, near, to preach to them.

So far as my observation goes, they have adopted the Sabbath preaching system—that is, one preacher will have three or four Sabbath appointments in the month, and to these he devotes his ministerial labors exclusively, each church paying a stipulated sum.

In answering the above question, may we not say, that their tendencies to Congregationalism may be one cause of their declension?

It has been a custom with some, that I have been acquainted with, when summer or fall season sets in, to begin their sacramental, protracted or camp-meetings, at which times they call together several ministers—who labor efficiently—have some gracious revivals—many are converted and taken into the church; but, little is done during the balance of the year, save their monthly appointments.

To be a little more specific I will say, there is a section of country, thickly settled, extending from the Sabine River to the Trinity—embracing several counties where they are comparatively dying out as a denomination.

If this is called in question, I stand pledged to give the facts in the cases. I have said nothing derogatory to their piety, as part of the great family of God.

Mr. Editor, I now think of continuing to give you some outlines of other denominations in East Texas, if this should strike your fancy, and it should see the light of day. If not, all right. S. Akins.

CHIVALRY.

Roland ou La Chevalerie, is the title of a work by M. E. J. Delecluze, of Paris. We believe there is no English, translation or American edition of it; a fact that is little to the credit of the discriminating, vigilance and enterprise of our leading American publishers; for it is one of the most delightful and instructive of works on a subject intimately connected with the character, manners, and morals of all the peoples of modern Europe and their American off-shoots.

The author is no friend of chivalry. Like Miguel Cervantes, he regards it as a fantastic humbug. But his method of exposing it is not that of irony or burlesque; it is that of elaborate historical and literary research, followed by a rigid comparison of the maxims and institutions of chivalry with the precepts of Christ, the suggestions of common sense, and the dictates of universal justice and of common humanity. Indeed, it scarcely required the labors of M. Delecluze to impress the reflecting mind with the fact that the practical morality of modern Europe, during seven or eight centuries past, has not derived its sanction from the Gospel of Calvary, so much as from the fables of chivalry.

It was about the eleventh century that chivalry, under the guise of an ally and champion of the Christian propaganda, commenced its work of competition with Christianity. It was not long in gaining the victory. In a temporal point of view, it had all the advantage. Christianity took hold of the human soul only, but chivalry took hold of the human flesh and the human imagination of all fleshly enjoyments. Moreover, it took hold of the passions of pride and revenge, and by some strange glamour of wild and unreasoning fancy, mingled those ingredients with the self-denying devotion of saints and the austere zeal of pilgrims. The truth is, it would be hard to conceive how so elevated and spiritual a code of morals as the Christian Gospel could be received by the European nations of the Middle Ages, without some alloying qualification, and it grew to be but too soon, not only the qualification of the law, but practically the law itself. So it has continued since, and at this moment the law that governs gentlemen in their private relations, both in Europe and America, is not the law of Christianity but the law of chivalry.

M. Delecluze enumerates three constituents of chivalry, as now practiced. These are the point of honor, the duel, and gallantry—"the three plagues of modern Europe," adds M. Delecluze. "The point of honor," the same author continues, "is essentially immoral, since it attaches the same importance to falsehood as to truth, and, appealing to the duel, is ready to sustain the cause of falsehood by violence and murder. This strange combination of ideas is the quintessence of the spirit of chivalry."

Reserve, the author also tells us, on the subject of women and marriage is habitual with the writers of antiquity; but from the eleventh century down to this time, those topics have filled countless books, and are nearly always treated in a spirit of scandal against the female sex, and of raillery at marriage. It is somewhat singular, indeed, that chivalry, proceeding pari passu with the nominal spread of Christianity, has developed tendencies destructive to marriage, which the Church has so strenuously endeavored to fortify. The new Free Love theory, of which we hear so much, is only new in name. It is, in fact, as old as chivalry, which encouraged sexual license.—[Sunday Delta.]

CROMWELL'S BIBLE.

"Puritanism," says Carlyle, "stood preaching in its bare pulpit, with nothing but the Bible in its hand." Remove that Bible, and the most glorious of all struggles in the annals of English history, becomes an enigma incapable of solution. The King James' version of the Bible was given to the people in 1611; and thirty years after, when one generation had grown familiar with its blessed truths, England was in the midst of her mighty struggle with despotic power and false religion.

Oliver Cromwell is the representative man of Puritanism. Bible principles in the hearts of such men, acting under an abiding impression of their accountability to God, made those stirring times. The "Huntington Farmer" was emphatically a Bible man. From God's Word he had drawn the elements of his character. It animated him in his struggles, and encouraged him when depressed. It gave a dignity to his every-day life among his children, scarcely excelled by that to which Providence led him to obtain as the victorious general, the wise statesman, the exalted ruler of a great nation.

Oliver's life at St. Ives and Ely, as a sober industrious man, is it not altogether as that of a true and devout man? He has renounced the world and its ways; its prizes are not the thing that can enrich him. He tills the earth; he reads his Bible; and daily assembles his servants around him to worship God.

Cromwell's attachment to the Bible never waned. Here is before me a copy of an edition of the Scriptures, which he is supposed to have caused to be published for the use of the soldiers of his army, within a few years of his death. The binding, as far as it can be traced without doing injury to the volume, is leathern; but it is closely covered with some kind of worsted work, coarse and of a plain pattern. The type is small, and the whole book is crowded. The title-page bears the print of London, 1653; and we further read on the torn corner, "Printed for Giles Calvert, and are to be sold at the sign of the Black Spread Eagle, near the West end of Paul's."

There is added "A brief Concordance, or Table to the Bible of the last Translation, serving for the most easie finding out of the most useful places therein contained, carefully perused and enlarged by Mr. J. Downame, B. in Divinitie. Published for the good of the Commonwealth." "Printed by W. DuGard for N. Bourn, and are to be sold at the South Entrance of the Royal Exchange. 1654. Cum Privilegio."

On a blank leaf between the Old Testament and the New, is written in a good hand, "John Darke, Son of William Darke, and Grandson of John Darke of Mackfield, England, was born 23d of January, 1728. And his daughter was born 16th of November, 1729."

The following memoranda are upon one of the leaves: "This Bible was purchased at Thomas Dobson's Book Store, at his Stone House in Second Street above Chesnut, in 1817. This edition is said to have been printed at the instance of Oliver Cromwell, for the use of his Soldiers."

"Captain Darke and Captain Rush were two Cavalry officers, who came to this country shortly after the Protector's death; and the first is probably the John Darke alluded to by his Grandson on the blank leaf of the title-page of the New Testament."

A scrap from the New York Mirror is pasted upon one of the covers of the Bible, containing a letter from Dr. Rush to John Adams, dated July 13th, 1812. In his letter Dr. Rush gives an account of a visit to a farm, ten or twelve miles from Philadelphia, upon which his ancestors had lived. "On my way home," he writes, "I stopped to view a family grave-yard, in which were buried three and a part of four successive generations, all of whom were the descendants of Captain John Rush, who with six sons and three daughters, followed William Penn to Pennsylvania, in the year of 1683. He commanded a troop of horse under Oliver Cromwell, and family tradition says he was personally known to him, and much esteemed by him as an active and an enterprising officer.

"The late General Dark of Virginia, and General J. Irvine, are a part of his numerous posterity. As the successor to the eldest sons of the family, I have been permitted to possess his sword, his watch, and the leaf of his family Bible, that contains the record of his marriage, and of the birth and names of his children, by his own hand."

Cromwell's Bible, published for the use of his soldiers! Cromwell's Bible, with the name of an ancestor of some of our worthiest citizens written upon its leaf! How natural the association of the struggle of those sterling old Puritan times with that of our days of seventy-six! The Puritan principles of Cromwell, like the hidden spring under the mountain, bursting through Stuart-restorations to the light of day! Those Bible principles of liberty and pure religion, battled for by those stern men of God—made our inheritance through their sweat and blood—are they not our richest possessions this day, in the land of liberty and of the Bible?

SCIENCE AND REVELATION.

Dr. Holmes delivered a lecture upon this subject at the Smithsonian Institute, Washington, recently, of which the National Intelligencer gives the following interesting abstract;

He premised, by saying that Providence has offered two books for man's study and improvement, neither contradicting the other, but each devoted to a particular branch of the human constitution. The book of nature is to be interpreted by the intellect. In that book are exercises for all the mental powers, but it contains little or nothing to inform and satisfy the spiritual wants of our being; for that we have the Bible, the other book, the book of revelation of Heaven itself. We must, therefore, not cry out "infidelity," if science appears to teach something which we suppose to be different from the statements of the Holy Book. Each book must stand for itself and be kept upon its own platform. The divinity of each rests on its own merits, but both are necessary to meet the whole round of our wants. "By their fruits ye shall know them" is a just rule of judgment. For want of the Bible and its guidance men wander in moral and spiritual darkness and mistake. Witness the Hindoo man of caste; he is for the most part as well informed on literature and science, as any English or American gentleman, yet for want of what the knowledge of and trust in the Bible imparts, his life is a wilderness of error, and he and his people are in the low moral social condition in which they are found. The lecturer then developed the main body of his discourse, which was in fact this, to reconcile the Mosaic account of the creation of the world with the doctrines of modern geology. He divided the crust of the earth, extending to a depth of forty thousand feet, into two primary parts, protozoic, secondary, and tertiary, subdividing each into two parts, the older and newer.

This makes six parts, to each of which he assigns one Mosaic day, during which periods, each consisting of tens of scores of thousands of our years, the earth was gradually prepared for the habitation of man, who comes upon the earth on the sixth day, and before God rested from his creative work. If a layer of one foot of the earth's crust—a large allowance—be made in one century, some idea of the antiquity of the globe may be obtained. He supposed Moses to have obtained his insight into the process of creation by a vision. The fall of man he deemed as necessarily ordained to come to pass, since the existing high pitch of intellect, affection and advancement of the race could not have been attained had not sin entered into the world. A numerous array of discoveries were brought to bear on the subject, going to give color to the lecturer's views. Amongst these were prominent two discoveries, one made by Sir Chas. Lyell, on the Red river, in Louisiana, of a human hip-bone which could not have been in the strata where found less than seventy-five thousand years; and another, of which the lecturer had personal cognizance, made on Jonathan's creek, near Zanesville, Ohio, of the perfect skeleton of a woman under a living rock. It was evident this woman was drowned in the creek, when its bed was twenty feet above its present surface, a period distant at the very least ten thousand years. These facts the lecturer did not consider as in conflict with the Bible, which no more undertakes to teach cronology than any other natural science. The lecture occupied nearly two hours in delivery.

The following curious paragraph is from the Cologne correspondent of the Continental Review: "We may now afford to smile at the singular prophesy of the Westphalian shepherd who lived some hundred and fifty years ago, and who predicted a terrible European war in the course of which the Turks should cool the feet of their horses in the Rhine." These things—thus runs the tradition—were to come to pass when carriages ran without horses, and the Prussian soldiers were dressed like the soldiers who crucified Christ. Carriages do run without horses, and the silhouette of a Prussian soldier in his tunic and helmet is in all respects that of a Roman legionary. But the superstitious who speculated on the singular prophesy could never reconcile with it the decline of the Turkish power and the manifest improbability of the Sultan's troops carrying the standard of the Prophet to the banks of the Rhine. They forgot that France has Algerine regiments of Spanish and Zouaves, and that many of them are as good Mussulmans as ever walked the streets of Stamboul.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15, 1859.

DISCOVERIES OF 1858 AND 1859.

La Semaine Celeniale has the following interesting account of the explorations now in progress throughout the world:

The world has been pretty well discovered. Portions only of Africa, Australia, Indo-China, the Indian Archipelago and the Polar Regions, remain for the enterprise of governments, learned societies, and men who are brave as well as curious.

Mrs. Ida Pfeiffer, after traveling through Palestine Northern Europe, and twice around the world, in a fifth journey attempted Madagascar. Queen Ranavolo received her kindly, then became suspicious, and finally ordered her to leave the island immediately. She was taken, with all other Europeans, it is supposed intentionally, to a low, swampy coast, where foreigners never escape the fever. She took the fever, was made worse by her homeward voyage, and died on the 7th of October last, at the age of sixty-one, in one of the suburbs at Vienna.

On the 27th of February last, the Sardinian traveler, Brun-Rollet, died at Khartoum, on the boundary between Nubia and Abyssinia. He had penetrated all the country bordering on the Upper Nile and discovered Lake No, in lat. 12 deg., and the Bahr Kellak, or Misseiad, which belongs to the western basin of the Nile. In 1855, he published in Paris, Le Nil Blanc and Soudan.

The Englishman, Coulthard, died a terrible death, by thirst, in the inner desert of Australia. A traveler, Babbage, found his body in a thicket, and a tin cup near by, on which he had scratched a few lines with a nail, which made known the frightful sufferings that preceded his death. Coulthard set out with two other Englishmen, Scott and Brooks, who probably have perished.

Adolph Schlagintweit has been murdered by a troop of rebels against the Chinese authorities, in a village of Thibet, not far from Yarkand.

The death of Dr. Edward Vogel, who had traveled over Lake Tsad, Bornu, Baguirmi and the country Wadai, west of Darfur, is almost a certainty. The rumor that he was murdered by the command of the Sultan Wadai, may have arisen from the probable fact that he was kept as a prisoner; a cause for either may be found in his imprudence in climbing to the peak of one of their sacred mountains.

The wife of Sir John Franklin is not yet resigned to bear the sorrowful name of widow. Last year she sent out the yacht Fox, in command of Capt. McClintock, to search for her husband. By the latest accounts, the Fox, taking the Beechy Island route, meant to sail into Fish River, passing to the east of King William's Land.

For some months past a new Arctic expedition has been in preparation in the United States. The worthlessness of the North-west Passage, discovered by Captain McClure, five or six years ago, cools no Arctic ardor; the open Polar Sea is now the great Arctic problem.

The Geographical Society of St. Petersburg has sent a number of naturalists to Siberia, and a learned Finn, Dr. Nordenskiold, of Helsingfors, has pursued his observations as far Spitzbergen. He there discovered anthracite coal and such a multitude of seals and walruses as promises rich returns to fishermen for years to come. He has also ascended the Spitzbergen mountain.

On the American continent an officer of the English Navy, Captain Palliser, has been so fortunate as to find a passage through the Rocky Mountains in British America. It may be of great political value in binding together the English Atlantic and Pacific possessions.

In South America, the Frenchman, Dr. Plassard, who is settled in Ciudad Bolivar, has undertaken an excursion into the interior of Venezuelan Guyana, and found gold to the South of the lower Orinco, toward the Ynruari.

At Rio Janeiro, Messrs. Capanema, Lages and Gonsalva Dias are preparing for a second expedition into the interior of Brazil, which is almost entirely unknown, and in the possession of wild Indian tribes. They will have a military escort.

Dr. Schmarda, the Austrian naturalist, is on his return from his voyage to Cape Sydney and New-Zealand. So also have Dr. Tschudi and Dr. Friesach returned from their expeditions into the interior of South America.

The Austrian corvette Carolina, on a visit to the harbors of South America, and the frigate Novara, on a voyage round the world, at the Philippines when last heard from, seem to have been quite forgotten by the Austrian journals, now full of war.

In the Southern Atlantic the English Captain Cubin, believes that he had, within the year, found a new group of islands on the track of Australian-bound vessels.

But the great magnetic center to which most discoverers instinctively turn, is still the interior of Africa. Those vast countries, which are represented in blank on our maps, have been attacked from all sides—east, west, north and south.

The renowned Dr. Robert Livingstone is now making his excursion in those countries which he discovered during his long journey from St. Paul de Loanda to Quilimane. He embarked last year, equipped with instruments for making scientific observations. He will first attempt to go up the Zambesi River in a canoe, which he has named "Ma Robert," or Robert's wife or mother, as the natives along the Zambesi have great respect for the wife and mother of a man whom they admire.

The English steamer, the Rainbow, sailed on the 6th January out of Bonny into the Gulf of Benin, to explore the country along the Niger. Ladislaus Magyar, of Theresiopol, in Hungary, who, after the Hungarian insurrection, became a citizen of Brazil, has hit upon a rather singular but very prudent way to penetrate into the mysteries of inner Africa with the greatest possible safety and advantage. He has just married the daughter of the black King of Bihe, in Upper Guinea. He has become Commander-in-chief of the armies of his father-in-law, and uses his authority and his soldiers to become acquainted with the countries lying in his neighborhood.

Jules Brauwere, commander of the corvette Oise, is now exploring the wholly unknown country through which the Gaboon River runs.

The Swedish discoverer, Anderson, has traveled Ovampa, on the west Coast of Africa, south of Benguela, in the direction of the Cunene River.

On the east and south coast of Africa, two English officers, Capt. Burton and Lieut. Speke, found and measured last summer the great Lake Uyiyi, between 3 deg. 20 min. and 8 deg. 40 min. south latitude—not to be confounded with Lakes Nyanza and Ukerewe, so much talked of in late years. Until this discovery, there was ground for belief in a great central sea in Africa, stretching from 12 deg. south latitude to the equator; but this discovery is conclusive that the great bodies of water which have hitherto been discovered at widely distant points are separate lakes.

The French interpreter, Leo des Avanchers, is traveling through the country which lies to the eastward of Lake Nyanza. The German traveler, Albert Roscher, has gone in the same direction, having left Zanzibar with the hope of penetrating far into the interior.

Fabre de Genoise, Governor of the Portuguese forts on the Zambesi, is making preparations for new explorations in Central Africa, of which he has already given such interesting descriptions in his book "Musta Cazembe."

Massaga, the Sardinian missionary, is now exploring the interior of Abyssinia; so also is Bayssiere.

The Upper Nile is the object of untiring exploration. It would be strange if, before the end of this century, its whole course were not as well known as is now that of the Thames, the Seine or the Rhine. While egyptologists and archæologists like Mariette, Deverio, Pommereuil, de Selby, Brugsch, Eckhold and others are searching out the mysteries of Ancient Egypt far up into Nubia, scientific men have undertaken, singly or in small numbers, to follow the Nile upward in spite of all the difficulties which for three thousand years have baffled the bravest explorers. Messrs. Frith and Windham are starting this month to go up the White Nile, in an iron boat, thirty-six feet long, drawing but one foot of water. They will be accompanied, or followed by Messrs. Thomassy, Miani and others.

Mr. McCarthy, the son of the geographer, has it in contemplation to travel on a new track to Timbuctoo from Algiers, where he has lived these eight years. According to his plan, he will pass through Laghouat and Goleah, then make a circuit to the east to get out of the way of a tribe of Arabs who have been bejuggled by a new prophet, and then continue his journey by Ghadames, Ghat and Lake Tsad.

Other travelers, also, such as Capt. Magnan, Baron Kraft, and Yussuf ben Gallahi, are bent on discovery, starting from Algiers or other northern points. Asia too, is being explored by many travelers; but as yet we have few details of their discoveries. Kriel has been sent by the Vienna Academy into Asiatic Turkey. Rey is exploring some hitherto neglected portions of Syria and Palestine. The brothers Schlagintweit are still continuing their researches in Central Asia. A Russian scientific expedition is engaged in the exploration of Chorasan, while a detachment of the French troops in Indo-China is escorting a scientific corps through that country. Many other savans have received missions from the Ministry of Public Instruction, or from the Paris Museum. Besides, the Catholic and Protestant missionaries are coming more and more to consider it a part of their duty to send home precise and comprehensive ethnographic and geographic intelligence of the countries through which they travel.

LETTER FROM DR. YOUNG.

A Visit to the President—An "Agent" in the White House—A Lady from Mississippi—Three Englishmen—"The Inclined Plane"—Mr. Brown the Presidential Ham-Merchant—Richmond—Statue of Washington—An Irishman on Pocahontas—A Narrow Escape—Sunday Schools and Revivals—The Imported Africans—Their Condition Bettered but the Law should not be Violated.

My previous letter to the Advocate was written at Washington, where I spent several days on business; but found time to call upon the President. The servant who answered the bell, took my overcoat and umbrella, and directed me to keep my hat, and take a seat in the east-room. This celebrated room is very large, has little furniture and nothing remarkable except the carpet, which was woven in one piece and cost forty thousand dollars. I took a seat, supposing the visitors should go in by turns, like going to mill, but seeing others come in after me ascending the stairs before me, I took my hat in my hand, and followed my nose until I found the reception-room. There were fifteen or twenty gentlemen in waiting, and I walked in and quietly took a seat to bide my time.

At the moment a small man, with thin face, sharp features, peaked nose, small black eyes, dressed in a well-worn frock, was shoving into the President's reluctant hands what appeared to be a subscription book—"Your name, Sir, will be of great service." "It is doubtless meritorious; but it is a rule I have adopted not to sign anything of the kind." The book was returned as the President rose and approached the door to speak to a lady coming in unattended. She introduced herself—resides in Mississippi—a native of Pennsylvania; and complimented the President upon his good looks and youthful appearance until the old gentleman seemed ready to blush, but got relief by returning the compliment, which he did in the readiest and happiest manner.

Next came three Englishmen—young men, plainly dressed, noble looking. One of them had a brother killed in the Crimean war, not unknown to the President. They were favorably introduced—conversed intelligently upon the present aspect of European affairs; came to look at our country, and were most gracefully welcomed. When they had staid long enough these gentlemen withdrew. But, to get rid of the lady visitor, and the next man that came in, the President had to slide them out of the room upon the "inclined plane," which I suppose he borrowed from the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."

"I am Mr. Brown," said a pert little round faced man who wore a wig, "this is my friend Mr. ———." "I am glad to see you gentlemen. Where are you from Mr. Brown?" "I live at Cincinnati; I am a friend of Mr. Pendleton." "Ah? Have you seen Mr. Pendleton recently? Do you know if he has arrived at Washington? He is looked for here I believe." "I hav'nt seen him lately, but I live close by him." Here a long pause ensued, intended doubtless to get Mr. Brown on the inclined plane; but Mr. Brown is a business man—a utilitarian—and has a purpose. "I am the Mr. Brown that presented President Pierce with a barrel of hams."—The gentlemen in waiting look at each other and smile. "They were very good hams I expect" said the President. "Yes sir, I am in that business; and I put up the best hams, and the nicest meat of any man that can be found;" and the porker went on to advertise his bacon and lard and grease, until many of the gentlemen in the room could hold in no longer, but laughed right out; and I thought I might do my country some service by relieving the President from his embarrassment, so I presented myself.

"I am a citizen of Louisiana—have no wares to advertise—no favors to ask—no complaints to make; called for no other purpose than to pay my respects to the Chief Magistrate." "You are an independent man! I am glad to see you Sir; it is really refreshing to see a gentleman who has neither complaints to make, nor favors to ask."

As I passed the outer door the lady visitor was hunting a lost glove, and Mr. Brown remarked to his friend, "Old Buck is a pretty good looking old fellow, and I dout believe he is half so mean as our papers make him out to be."

From Washington, I returned to Georgia, passing through Richmond, where on our way North we had spent a delightful day with Doctors Dogget and Lee. Richmond is an interesting place to visit, allowing some of the most picturesque views to be seen in America. It is very rich in historical recollections, and works of art.

We entered the house of Burgesses, and stood where Patrick Henry stood when he made his immortal speech, "Give me liberty, or give me death." The statues which adorn the capitol and public grounds are doubtless all very fine works of art, but whoever looks at that of Washington, giving his exact size, shape and proportions from actual measurement, will feel disappointed. He can scarcely believe that the capacity of that chest can be the measure of Washington's strength, or the size of that brain the measure of his intellect.

Just beyond Petersburg the cars stopped a short time, and some one was pointing out the spot where Pocahontas rescued Captain Smith, and the passengers were crowding around to see, when an elderly Irish gentleman, who had several ladies under his charge, and who seemed by his loud conversation and patronizing airs to claim consideration, approached, and as if trying to recollect, commenced, loud enough for all in the cars to hear him: "Pocahontas, Pocahontas, Pocahontas,—ah yes, daughter! I remember, Pocahontas was one of the greatest Indian warriors that ever came to this country." The passengers survived it; but you might have thought Dr Marshall was in danger of rupturing a blood-vessel.

A day or two before we arrived at Columbus, Georgia, during a storm which passed over the place, the projecting portion of one of the chimneys, extending about four feet above the roof of the Perry House, the principal hotel in the place, fell with such violence as to pass through the roof and every floor of the house, down to the ground-floor, where it passed through a bed, from which a lady had risen only long enough to gain her feet, and witness her singular providential escape. We saw the place where the bed stood, the breach made in the floor, and the brick which composed the disjointed portion of the chimney, not at all broken apart. The only theory which I can conceive to account for this singular freak is, that the projecting portion of chimney was broken from its main stem by a whirl-wind, and carried to such a height in the air, that in falling, it acquired the momentum necessary to carry it through roof and floors. The opening made in the roof was about four feet from the stem of the chimney at its exit through the roof.

At Macon, a very interesting meeting was in progress at the Methodist Church, under Rev. Mr. Parks—about seventy had joined society in two weeks, and most of them professed to have found peace in believing. Here I heard Wm. R. Hunter deliver one of the most interesting addresses to the Sabbath-school children, I have ever listened to; and I heard nothing while I was gone that delighted me more than to hear these eight hundred children sing—

"I want to be an angel,
And with the angels stand,
A crown upon my forehead,
A harp within my hand."

They were also having a meeting of a good deal of interest at the Methodist Church at Savannah, and this interest has been kept up for several months.

At Savannah, I saw the celebrated C. H. Lamar, and his ship "Wanderer." I had previously seen at Columbus quite a number of the Africans imported by him in this vessel. Mr. Lamar has the address and bearing of an accomplished gentleman, but where his feelings are enlisted he is bold and daring, to a degree that renders him apparently reckless. He is now under indictment, waiting his trial for violating the statute against the slave-trade.

The public sentiment in Georgia, and especially at Savannah, has undergone a remarkable change upon the subject of the slave-trade within a few months; in so much, that there is not the least possible chance now, of convicting Lamar or any of his associates. The Wanderer is the most beautiful and graceful vessel I ever saw on the water, and she is probably the fastest sailing vessel on the ocean.

As for the Africans she brought over, they would not be readily distinguished from the negroes found on our plantations. Their teeth are filed in a peculiar manner, to designate the tribe to which they belong. They are not so large of stature—have smaller bones and smaller muscles than our better fed and better conditioned slaves; but they jabbered and laughed, and seemed quite cheerful and happy; and, while I looked upon these fellow-creatures with strange feelings of curiosity, and tried to contemplate the great, absorbing subjects brought to my mind by the scene before me in the light of Christianity, I could not resist the conviction forced upon my mind, that the change has been a happy one for them; that their condition in life and their chances for the life to come have been vastly improved by the change, under the Providential ordering of Him who "maketh the wrath of man praise him." I try to think of the matter in the light of the great law of love, and try it by the most exalted standard of christian duty, and certainly, if I were a poor benighted, wandering African, and could base my judgment upon my present knowledge of the condition of slaves in the Southern States, I should regard that man as my benefactor who should bring me away from barbarism and a living death, and place me on a plantation where I should be fed and clothed, my mind be trained to some useful purposes, and my soul lay hold on eternal life, brought to light in the gospel.

Away then with all false notions of philanthrophy, got somewhere outside of the Bible, and foreign to any teaching or principle of Christianity. If slavery is wrong, let us get rid of it; if it is right let us approve it, and sustain it; and following the example of Jesus Christ and his apostles, let us inculcate the Christian duties belonging to the relations which it creates.

A middle aged, stout, well-looking negro-man waited on me at the Exchange Hotel, in Richmond, Va. David was a member of the Baptist Church, and seemed to be very pious. He asked me if I would not like to go and witness a large sale of slaves to take place that day, directing me at the same time how to find the place. I told him I did not care to go, I did not want to purchase, and negroes were no great curiosity to me; that down in Georgia, I had recently seen quite a number of them directly from Africa, brought over in a ship. "Why Master, aint that against the State-law? "Yes, that is against the law." "Well, Master, won't they punish them for it?" "I dont know, David, whether they will or not." "Why Master, how dem folks look? Can they talk? Do they know anything?" "I told him they looked much like other black folks, only rather small; could only speak a few words in English, and had their teeth filed, so as to give them a savage appearance when their lips were parted." "Well, well," said David, "may be they are better off here than where they come from. Bless God, we should never any of us poor people have known that we had a soul or a Saviour if we had not been brought here and made slaves."

If it is worth anything to a people to have their physical condition bettered, their minds improved, and their chances for heaven greatly enhanced, it would be a great blessing to the Africans to bring them here, regulated and protected by law; but then this is only one side of the subject. How it might affect us, is a question for our statesmen to consider. This, only, will I venture to say, that every good citizen should set his face against any violation of the law.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTE.

Ma. Editor: As some notices of the next meeting of the Educational Institutute of the M. E. Church, South, have been published in several of the Advocates, in which an error as to the day appointed for that meeting was perpetrated, I have thought it would be well to have the correction inserted in all of them. The next session of the Institute is to take place in Atlanta, Georgia, on Wednesday, the 27th of July. As the time for the session has been changed to the mid-summer, to suit the convenience of teachers, it is hoped that as many of that class as can possibly do so, will attend. Besides, the usual business of a teachers' convention, the Institute will probably be invited to consider some questions of general interest and importance.

A fine programme of lectures, essays, and reports is provided, which of itself would constitute a sufficient attraction. Besides all this, the mere reunion of teachers, the mutual forming of acquaintances, the collation of educational intelligence, and the result of experience, all under the genial influence of fraternal and Christian feelings, will make it an occasion of manifold benefit and enjoyment to all present.

All Methodist teachers are particularly invited to connect themselves with the Institute.

The people of the young city of Atlanta expect a large gathering, and will be fully prepared for it. Let them not be disappointed.

THE HERE AND THERE OF A BIBLE AGENT.

Autaugaville—Good Time—The St. Nicholas and a Conversation—Camden, and a Protracted Meeting—Mobile—The Moral Influence of Cities—May day Celebration—Auburn and its Schools, etc.

From Dayton I came to Selma, and took a boat up the river to Vernon; then hired a buggy and went out to Autaugaville, two miles distant. There I stopped with Rev. Thos. P. Green, the preacher in charge of the M. E. Church. I was glad to meet with him and his accomplished wife, as I had the pleasure of uniting them in matrimony, when stationed at Tuskaloosa. They are both highly esteemed by the community, and promise much usefulness to the church.

There are four denominations in Autaugaville—the Baptists, Episcopalians, the Methodist Protestants and the Methodist Episcopal. The two last are the largest and most influential. I preached in the M. E. Church on Sabbath, March 27th, to a very fine congregation. The occasion was to me one of interest, for the Master of assemblies seemed to be present to win the devotions of His people. The collection for the Bible cause was a good one. The pastor of the M. P. Church, the Rev. Mr. Harper, was made a Life Member. At night I presented the cause in the M. P. Church to a congregation, if anything, larger than the one in the morning. The amount desired was raised, by making the Rev. T. F. Green L. M. of the B. S. Great attention and solemnity characterized the service of the hour. The people of God gathered around the altar, to renew their covenants with Him, and to invoke a refreshing season of grace. The faith of not a few sprung into lively exercise—realized a present God—when joy blessings came down into their hearts, and rejoicings and praises broke from their lips: this was one time when giving seemed indeed a religious act, and the offering sanctified of God. How easy it is to ask, and how easy to make contributions to the Lord when heavenly influences pervade the heart, and the eye of faith penetrates the mists of time, and fixes its gaze upon the substantial and fadeless inheritance of the eternal world. How long will that day linger in its coming, when the greed of gain shall cease to tyrannize over souls redeemed with hallowed blood and made capable of fellowship with God? When will the multitudes of earth drop their muck rakes and look up, and take the crowns of life which mercy stoops to bestow upon them?

What a glorious day for Christianity it will be, when its lovers and friends buy and sell and sow and reap for God. When every vessel, and rail road, every machine-shop and manufactory, houses of merchandize and fields, shall be employed for Him, and the enlargement of His kingdom.

From Autaugaville I made a short visit home, and then took the St. Nicholas and went down the Alabama river. This boat is under the control of Capt. Cox, who has a large interest in it. It is very popular, and much patronized; as is also the St. Charles which is owned by the same Company. Capt. Cox is a man of very gentlemanly deportment, kind and obliging to the passengers. He seems to keep everything about the boat at work with the least possible friction. The engines, wheels, shafts, pistons, all keep their legitimate places, and smoothly fulfil their offices. The employees on deck and above, do their business with system, dispatch and little noise. The Captain seems never excited, never blusters, but keeps quiet and self-composed, and by his good sense and force of character holds all about him under orderly control.

Going down the river I was in conversation with two elderly gentlemen, Capt. A., ex-member of Congress, and Judge C., formerly of Alabama, now of Mississippi. The subjects of religion and old age were dwelt upon. I was greatly profited by the conversation, especially a portion of it, in reply, by Judge C., to some remarks I made in reference to an ungodly old age. "When earthly ties are nearly all broken, and earthly associations lost; in this state of isolation from the world, with an ill-spent past, and a cheerless and uninviting future—how sad is life." "Yes," said he, "but as for myself, I am a happier man now than I was at twenty years of age; I feel that I am nearer my heavenly home—death has no terrors for me, I try to keep always ready; I never lie down at night without repeating the 23d Psalm, 'The Lord is my shepherd etc.'" Thus he continued in this pious strain, until we were melted into tenderness, and could say with Peter on the Mount of Transfiguration, "Lord it is good for us to be here." The whistle blew and I got off at Bridgeport, reluctantly breaking off from a conversation so pleasant. Yet I took away a blessing which he invoked upon me, and which cheered me on my way: which was, "May you dwell in the house of the Lord forever."

I went into Camden from Bridgeport, some four miles distant. I found this place larger than I expected to find it. On passing by the Presbyterian Church I saw several persons coming out of it, and recognized among them Rev. Dr. Nall, whom I knew when I was stationed in Mobile. He was holding a protracted meeting. We met and he asked me to preach at night, I did so, and invited penitents to the altar, when a large number approached. I preached also at his request on Sunday night—the religious interest still remaining good. Monday night we held a Bible meeting in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Services were opened by Rev. Mr. Weir, the pastor, after which I made an address; followed by Col. White, a lawyer and ex-member of Congress, who dwelt upon the secular advantages of the Bible, upon communities and upon government. I felt greatly indebted to him for his valuable assistance. The Rev. Mr. Lane of the Methodist Church in Camden, also aided the cause in a closing address. The collection however, neither met my wishes nor transcended my expectations, and yet some thought it was good for Camden. It was court week, but how far that militated against the Bible cause I am unable to say.

From Camden I passed down to Mobile, where I spent several days, finding a comfortable and pleasant home in the family of the Rev. Mark S. Andrews, pastor of the Franklin-street Methodist Church. I found that he had taken up a collection in his congregation for the Bible cause; so also had Rev. A. S. Andrews taken one in his charge, the St. Francis-street M. E. Church. On Subbath, the 25th April, I preached in the Government-street Church (Presbyterian) and raised a good collection. The Bible Society of Mobile passed a resolution to raise two thousand dollars, to supply the city and Baldwin county with the word of God. To carry out this measure, they appointed a large committee to canvass the city, and to raise funds privately, in addition to what had been publicly raised. I trust that the enterprise will meet with merited success, and that the thousands of this city and around it, may receive, and read and love the holy book. Mobile is an important commercial centre, is largely visited during the business months, and must exert upon all the country tributary to it a great moral influence for good or evil. The vices of cities become the vices of the country, and are as contagious as the epidemics that visit them, but much more wide spread. How greatly to be desired then, that these marts of trade should have a pure moral atmosphere, so that none can be poisoned by breathing it.

From Mobile I came home, where I spent the first week of May. Attended a May celebration at the chapel of the Female College, presided over by the Rev. E. D. Pitts. It was at night, the chapel was beautifully illuminated, and hung with festoons of evergreens. The young Misses, twelve in number, were dressed so as to represent the four seasons of the year. The chosen Queen of May, all blithe and fairy-like, made her appearance amid the rejoicings of her fair sisters, when the coronation ceremonies took place. The address to her royal majesty was chaste and touching. After the crowning was over, the lovely Queen seated herself upon a throne perfumed and canopied with flowers. The music was exquisite, being vocal and instrumental, without any excess of either, but harmoniously blended. This may be readily understood when it is known that Mrs. Geo. Dillard, formerly Miss Williams, conducted this department of the evening's entertainment. I have never seen an occasion of the sort in which everything was arranged in such beautiful taste. The crowded audience were thrilled with delight, and slowly retired at a late hour, as if unwilling to part with these seldom-recurring innocent festivities. This school, under the skilful order and wise management of Mr. Pitt and his assistants, is steadily prospering. Mr. P. has taught successfully at Summerfield, Ala., and at Mansfield, La. The community appreciates his qualifications as a teacher, and are pleased with his permanent location in their midst.

Auburn is also furnished with a superior male school, under the superintendance of Mr. Wm. F. Slaton. He is regarded by those who know him well, and who are judges of scholarship as one of the best educators in the state. He knows how to control his school, so as to make his pupils fear and honor him. He takes great pleasure in their advancement, and seeks to educate them head and heart. Reading the Scriptures and prayer enter regularly into the exercises of the school-room. Two young men, regular graduates of colleges of fine standing, are his assistants. The course in the various branches of education is almost as thorough as in the ordinary colleges of the country. With such a preparatory school as this, the East Alabama Male College, located here, and which is to open in October next, ought to succeed well.

SPREAD OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Mr. James Brooks, senior, editor of the New York Express, who has for some months been traveling in Europe, Asia and Africa, in one of his interesting letters to the Express, written on board the Peninsula and Oriental Company's steamship Pera, in the Mediterranean, on the passage from Alexandria to Southampton, thus sketches the motley crew on board:

Our 200 passengers are made up of all sorts of people, but all have a history, and a very instructive story. There is the New Zealander, (no cannibal, but fat as if cannibal,) from a healthy, and as he says, glorious country. He has not been "home" for twenty years, but is now going with his wife and babies, all sleek, hale and hearty. There is the Tasmanian, whose head is full of sheep and wool, and he, with his family, is on his way home, too, to talk over with old neighbors and old friends the wonders of Tasmania. Then, there is the Australian, from gold fields, and sheep fields, and all other sorts of fields, who proclaims his New South Wales or New Holland, to be more than El Dorado. All are extolling the happy lands they emigrated to, and proclaiming their intention to return. Then, we have the Englishman, now of about every line from Shanghai to Aden, from the isle of Sunda to the Arabian Sea, who talk of lands, and of rivers, of countries, and of seenes, we Americans have scarcely read of, and certainly have never thought of. One tells us of his adventures up the Euphrates; another how he goes on the Indus or the Ganges. Some talk Hinduo, and thus confound the rest of us, who have only got in Arabic far enough to ask for bread and water. There are little white English children sucking Hindoo nurses, and there are bigger white English children, speaking little else but Hindoo. All that talk, are talking of men and events, and things that are dreams to me. The Punjaub or Beloochistan, is as familiar to them as Regent street or Cheapside. But alas! what pale, wan faces almost all of them have! What havoc the India climate has made upon the portly person of the man, and the once bright cheek of the woman! How puny the poor children look, and as if life would hardly hold them together to be reinvigorated by the climate of old England! There is nothing more deplorable than the sacrifice of British life in India. I saw going up the Nile, as I came down, the best life and blood of England on its way to India—men strong and portly—women in all the flush and bloom of English life, and children, too, as strong as children can be—but I see here coming down, what is ever coming from India, exhausted life, broken health, destroyed livers, wan complexion—only the wreck and ruins of men, women and children. All parts of India are not thus destructive of life, but many of the stations are. The parties whom I see returning, have been participants, more or less, in all the trials of the India rebellion, and their anecdotes and hair-breadth escapes make their piteous tales most interesting. Their presence, their narrations, their stories, also fill, and almost overwhelm the mind with the magnitude of the now boundless British Empire. These groups of people now going "home" are from regions beyond that for which even an Alexander sighed, and of which Roman ambition knew nothing. The mighty arm of England stretches so far now, that it girdles and embraces the earth, and its strong pulse is felt everywhere by all the people in the habitable globe. Rival as she is of ours, often our enemy, our greatest competitor, certainly, I cannot say that I regret to see such a stock, such a nation thus the earth embracing. I see the time coming, when we in the West shall meet her in the East, when the commerce of the world will belong to our race, our tongue, our laws, our institutions, our ideas of progress and civilization. So many millions now speak our tongue in America and Australia, as well as in England, that it is rapidly becoming the universal language. Twenty years hence, he who speaks English need scarcely speak any other tongue to make himself intelligible the world over. The twenty years past has wrought most amazing changes over the world in our tongue. Then, an Englishman could not journey on the continent of Europe, nor in the East, without French or Italian. Now the English language is spoken in every city and in every hotel, where the English traveler is likely to go. The cup of tea, the English and American "institution," could scarcely be had twenty years ago, out of England and America. Now it can be had not only all over Europe, but in Turkey, in Syria, in Jerusalem, in Cairo, everywhere in short, as good as it is in London or New York. The hotels now, generally speaking, are filled for our wants, our tastes, our palates. In short, the English language, the English tastes are almost everywhere on the lines of travel.

COLLEGE EXAMINATIONS.

We notice a report, in the Oxford Mercury, of the manner of conducting the annual examination of the students in the University of Mississippi, which is somewhat novel, and must be beneficial. If we mistake not, it is very similar to, if not identical with the plan pursued by President Rivers, of the Florence Wesleyan University. The Mercury says:

At the opening of the exercise, the class is furnished with pen, ink, and paper. A printed slip, containing a long string of questions, is then handed to each member, answers to which he is required to write out within a given time—say four hours. No one is permitted to leave the room, nor communicate with a fellow-student. As these examinations are conducted in the Chapel, there is no difficulty in completely isolating the young men. The Faculty stand guard, to see that all things are conducted with entire fairness. The attempt to defraud in any way whatever is punished with immediate forfeiture of membership in the University. Upon completing his performance, the student attaches to his paper, not his own name, but a number which he has received by lot, and which is made known only to the President. The Professors examine the papers, and report the proper grades for the several members without any knowledge of the authorship of the productions. In summing up the results of the examination at the close of the week, the President instructs the Recording Secretary whose names to enter opposite the numbers. The examinations are thus made very deliberate and impartial. Each student is tested by identically the same standard, since all are required to answer the same questions, a thing that is utterly impracticable in an oral examination. Equal weight is given to the written examination with the report for the year for oral and written performances in the class-room. At these closing periods the young men buckle on all their armor, and ting like Trojans. The Faculty are quite lavish of compliment upon the manner in which the present class have brought themselves up to the work. They are all to be recommended to the Board of Trustees, as worthy of graduation. We can bear testimony, personally, to the high-toned and gentlemanly bearing of all with whom we are acquainted. On Saturday last the usual honors were allotted and speakers' places assigned.

The session that is now drawing to a close, has been throughout, characterized by good order and diligent attention to study. The scare people got just before Christmas about typhoid fever, materially diminished the number of new-year applicants; still the present number of students, 170, is quite encouraging. But, for our part, we would prefer reporting 300 or 400.

Since the above was in type, we have seen Dr. Rivers' plan, and will publish it next week.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE REV. D. B. LEYNE.

LATE OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

My first acquaintance with our deceased brother Leyne, was in the fall of the year 1849, when he was in charge of Mount Zion circuit, Alabama Conference. I had frequently heard of him as the eccentric "Irishman," and had imbibed a degree of prejudice against him. At the time above stated, I attended a camp-meeting on his circuit, and by personal intercourse with him, had my prejudices somewhat, though not entirely, removed. At the next Conference, held at Columbus, Mississippi, he was appointed as junior preacher on Greene circuit. I saw him once during this year.

The next year (1851) he was appointed to Athens circuit, on which I resided as a local preacher. He had been on the circuit but a short time when I became perfectly satisfied that I had previously wholly mistaken his character. We soon became knit together, like Jonathan and David. We labored together at various protracted meetings—for he had the circuit in a revival blaze during almost the entire year. I therefore knew him well, and knew him but to love him.

It is true, as brother Hamill remarks, that, "the novelty of his thoughts, manner, and accent, would often provoke a smile;" yet he was truly "mighty in the scriptures." I have had many a friendly dispute with him on points of doctrine, around the family hearth; and when he would foil me, which he invariably did, (as I generally took the wrong side of the question purposely to draw him out,) he would, with his usual pleasantry, remark, "Ah, my brother, you do greatly err, not knowing the Scriptures."

Brother Leyne was as fearless as he was pious. On one occasion we were holding a night-meeting—a considerable revival being in progress—when "some rude fellows of the baser sort," known to be desperadoes, armed with pistols and knives, commenced a disturbance on the outside of the Church for the purpose of breaking up the meeting. Without suspending the exercises of the altar, he stepped to a window and with the activity of a cat, leaped out, and the first thing they knew the man of God stood unarmed, so far as carnal weapons were concerned, in their midst. The conduct was decidedly unequal: they could not face that kind of music, but scampered off like scared dogs. They did not attempt to disturb that meeting again.

I was present when he offered himself to Bishop Paine for the missionary field, in California or elsewhere. He was at a missionary-meeting, at which the Bishop, by invitation, preached a sermon on the cause of missions, at "old Green-briar Church," Monroe county, Mississippi; Brother Leyne had frequently mentioned the subject to me before, and had expressed his willingness, even anxiety, to consecrate himself to the cause of Christ in any field. After he offered himself nurserersly to the Bishop, he remarked to me, "Now I am relieved of a heavy burden, and am happy again."

On Sunday, the 28th of September, 1851, brother Leyne and myself parted, to meet no more on earth. I came to Texas and he went to California. Shall we not meet again "on the other shore?" That he is "not at home" I have no doubt. One who knew his manner of life as I did, needed not to be told that, when he came to die, "all was right in that direction." "Peace be to his ashes."

DR. YOUNG'S LETTER.

Dr. Young's letter will be read with interest. It must be understood, however, that the Editor is not responsible for the opinions of others, especially on the slave-trade. We endorse the Doctor's opposition to these violations of law. No christian can favor such things. We publish the part of his letter on the subject simply as a matter of interesting intelligence, as an indication of that remarkable change of public opinion on this subject which has been for some time taking place in the South. This letter is not from a interested politician—but from a sober, intelligent gentleman, and an excellent christian minister. Let us not ignore the state of things of which this letter is an indication, but awake to it, think about it, pray over it, and act in the fear of God.

A CALIFORNIA MURAT.

In the Murats in Europe give out, they can find a hopeful candidate for the throne of Naples in the gentleman mentioned in the following paragraph, from the California, of April 6: "A poor, wretched-looking man was found upon the street last evening, and brought to the station-house in a state of helpless drunkenness. He was placed in one of the cells and laid out upon the asphaltum floor, and at half-past seven o'clock last evening he was attacked by an epileptic fit, and but for the prompt kindness of the officer in attendance, the poor fellow might have died in agony. Upon inquiry we learn that the man's name is Louis Murat, and that he is a lineal descendant of Joachim Murat, King of Naples, under the reign of Napoleon Bonaparte. He arrived in this country in 1849, having command means and letters of credit; the former he squandered, and the latter he lost, and for two years he has been a common street-bummer."

THE CHARACTER NAPOLEON CLAIMS.

In an article recently published in the Moniteur, ostensibly addressed to the German powers, the Emperor of the French makes some bold claims as to his own political position. After saying that "In Germany as well as Italy, France seeks to maintain and strengthen nationalities recognized by treaties," the article adds that for ten years the Emperor has exerted his influence to remove difficulties and settle them equitably; that he has supported the constitutional throne of the Queen of Spain; that by friendly mediation in Switzerland he settled the Neufchatel difficulty, and prevented war between that republic and Prussia; that in Italy he has saved the Pope, and inspired moderate views everywhere; that he played the dispute between the German Confederation and Denmark respecting the Duchies, and adds that what his government "intends to make respected in Italy" it will respect in Germany.

Rev. T. P. Chymes is not dead, but alive and well. We rejoice to hear it, from his own letter, which we shall publish next week.

Revival Notices are crowded out this week, but will appear next.

Editorial, this week, has to make way for local matter.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

ophesy Nearly Fulfilled.

book was published in Philadelphia in 1813, and written by N. J. Eliah, which the Pittsburg Dispatch says contains words: "The time will come when the people will travel stages moved by steam engines, from one city to another, ost as fast as birds fly, fifteen or twenty miles an hour. A ttage will act out from Washington in the morning, passeo will break fast at Baltimore, dine at Philadelphia, and sup New York the same day. To accomplish this, two sets of ays will be laid, so nearly level as not in any place to devi more than two degrees from a horizontal line, made of wood ron, on smooth parts of broken stone or gravel, with a rail ble the carriages on that they may pass each other in erent directions, and travel by night as well as by day; and passengers will sleep in these stages as comfortably as they do in steam stage boats. Twenty miles per hour is about ty-two feet per second; the resistance of the air will then about one pound to a square foot, but the body of the car- will be shaped like swift-swimming fish to pass easily ugh the air. A steam-engine that will consume from a quar- to a half a cord of wood, will drive a carriage one hundred eighty miles in twelve hours, with twenty or thirty passen- s, and will not consume six gallons of water. The carriages ll not be overloaded with fuel or water. These engines will ve boats ten miles per hour, and there will be many hundred mboats running on the Mississippi and other Western waters prophesied thirty years ago by one who could predict then ster than the Post can now. But the velocity of boats through ater can never be made to equal the velocity of carriages rough air, because the resistance of the water is eight hun- red times the resistance of air.

e Camp-Tent of Napoleon.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Times, in his let- of May 12, writes: The camp tent of the Emperor Napo- n, which preceded him to Italy, was made by Mexis Godil- n, and is in white and blue striped tent cloth, doubled. Its ght is about fifteen feet. It is divided into three compart- nts—a saloon, bed-room and dressing-room. Doors in the ch permit a passage from one room to the other, and win- ws are pierced for ventilation. An iron bed, folding seats d three small tables, one for the toilet, compose the furniture the Imperial residence. The tent is remarkable for its per- ct finish, the facility with which it can be put up and taken wn, and its general adaptation to the purpose for which it is designed. It was made five years ago, for the war in the imea, and started on its journey as far as Marseilles, but the mperor changed his mind then, and the tent has lain ever ce in the flag-room of the Tuileries. But, what is curious, e iron bed now in this tent, the toilet furniture and the table rvice in silver, belonged to the first Emperor, and accom- nied him to nearly all his campaigns; and as these cam- igns were so many victories, Louis Napoleon is going to ow himself upon the destiny of these victorious wash-basins d saucepans. He hopes on the fields of Marengo and Lodi, sleep upon and draw inspiration from the same bed on which reamed and schemed his great uncle, and on which he planned e great battles that have made the name of Napoleon so illus- ious. As a superstition, there are more absurd ones than this Louis Napoleon.

he War in Italy.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE ARAGO brings London and Liverpool dates to May 30. Cotton was steady—tone of the market improved. See our Commercial article.

Garibaldi the real Hero of Italian Independence.

Telegraph dispatches from the seat of war, via Paris, confirm the important intelligence of the evacuation of Como by the Austrians, and state that Garibaldi had proceeded from Varesu, where report by the last steamer left him, to Como, where large numbers of volunteers were joining him from all the surrounding country. Besides the volunteers from Lombardy, numerous re-inforcement had reached Garibaldi's camp from the Canton of Tiabino, in Switzerland.

Garibaldi takes Como.

The Austrians had been driven from Como, and were rapidly retreating from all points on the Lake of Como towards Milan. Garibaldi's troops had occupied Camerlo Secco, and before leaving Como a severe engagement took place between the Austrian troops and the force under Garibaldi.

The Austrians met the Revolutionists, and vigorously disputed their approach to the city; but after a furious combat, were defeated and driven back with severe loss. The Hallno troops pursuing them into the city, which they finally captured at the point of the bayonet; the Italians fighting at the disadvantage of being almost without artillery.

Garibaldi, gathering new forces as he advanced, made his appearance before Como on the 26th, with a well appointed army of 10,000 to 15,000 men.

The city was defended by a garrison of about 7000 men, which, though much inferior in number to the attacking party, was better organized, and had the advantage of position.

The fight began about 10 A. M. and lasted till after one P. M., the Austrians contesting street by street and house by house, with determined bravery. For three hours and upwards the furious hand to hand battle raged, but the Austrians were at last completely overpowered and driven out at the point of the bayonet.

The Italians hotly pursued, and the fighting was subsequently renewed at the village of Camerlete, when the Austrians were again defeated and put to general route.

The loss on both sides, during the two engagements, was very great, but no accurate list of killed and wounded had been forwarded when the steamer left.

All accounts agree that this was the most brilliant engagement of the present war. Garibaldi had also occupied the neighboring town of Secco, and seized the steamers on Lake Como.

The People Rally to Garibaldi.

Every where he and his army were received with the warmest sympathy by the people. At Como the popular rejoicing knew no bounds. The bells of the Churches were rung, the whole city illuminated, rockets sent up and everything done that could manifest the joy of the people.

At Come the National Guard had placed themselves on a war footing and joined the standard of Italian independence, and large numbers of volunteers were hastening from all quarters to increase the forces of the militia.

The national movement is gaining strength daily, and great confidence is felt in the success of the great leader of Italian independence.

The inhabitants of Secco had declared themselves free and independent of the yoke of Austria, and were organizing the militia to aid in driving the hated Austrians from Italy.

A revolutionary proclamation was issued by Garibaldi, and citizens of all ranks flocked to his standard.

According to later advices, Garibaldi's vanguard was advancing in the direction of Monza.

The intelligence of the occupation of Como by Garibaldi had reached Milan, where it had created much excitement, and an outbreak was daily anticipated.

All the more wealthy citizens of Como and Milan are leaving the country to avoid the horrors of war.

Seizure of the Austrian Steamers—Forays from Switzerland.

In the meantime there had been severe fighting on Lake Maggiore, the Swiss could no longer be restrained and were passing down from the mountains, and it was believed that the Austrians would soon have to retire from their positions in the Southern Tyrol.

The latest despatch from Berne says the whole Val Telline is in a blaze of revolution.

All the Austrian steamers on Lake Maggiore had been seized, one of them by a band of 800 Swiss.

The Sardinians had also gotten possession of the town of Cenobbia at the head of the Lake, from which the Austrians had attempted to drive them out, but failed. The cannonading lasted three hours, but the Austrians were finally compelled to retire.

The Austrians Passed the Ticino.

Advices from headquarters, at Alessandria, are to the 29th May. There had been no more fighting on the Ticino, but the French were advancing and the Austrians retiring.

An Austrian corps d'armee of 50,000 men had already re-crossed the Ticino in the direction of Piacenza.

No further engagements were expected on the Sardinian side of the river.

The Austrians would now assume the defensive inside their own line.

No important movement of the allied army has yet been made, although our lines are being extended and the reinforcements which are constantly arriving are being sent off to the respective positions assigned to them in the line.

The Emperor Napoleon and the allied troops are in perfect health. Provisions are abundant, and the soldiers are in the highest spirits.

Spain Joins France—Portugal Neutral.

LONDON, May 30.—Active negotations have been in progress between the Cabinet of St. James and that of Lisbon, since the fact that Spain had concluded a treaty of alliance with France had become known.

According to this treaty, Spain engages to increase her army to 250,000 men to co-operate with the allies in case the war should become European.

It is reported a secret clause of the treaty alludes to the eventual partition of Portugal, and pledges the aid of France to secure the possession of the Island of Cuba to Spain.

Under the influence of the danger threatening Portugal by this alliance the Cabinet have adopted the policy of England, and declared her neutrality in the present war.

Tuscany not yet Recognized.

BERLIN, May 28. "The Provisional Government of Tuscany has not yet been recognized by either Russia, Prussia, Turkey, or England. The Ministers of each country have hauled down their colors.

Naples in Danger.

Negotations were in progress between England and France, respecting the recognition and resumption of diplomatic relations with the kingdom of Naples. England is endeavoring to induce France to resume friendly relations with that power simultaneously with her.

A conspiracy against the crown Prince of Naples has been discovered, in which several colonels of the Swiss regiments stationed there have become compromised.

Popular Movement in Parma—Reported Resignation of Gortschakoff—Empress Eugenie's Reception of the Great Bodies of State—Plans for Hungarian Independence—The Battle of Montebello.

LONDON, May 28.—The London Times, Vienna correspondent gives the Austrian version of the battle of Montebello.

Count Gyulai, the Commander in Chief of the Army of Italy, reports that his loss at the battle of Montebello was 290 killed, 718 wounded, and 200 lost and missing.

Gen. Gyulai says that the French force engaged in the battle amounted to 40,000 but says nothing about the Austrian force engaged.

Some French authorities say that the French force was not much over 4000 men. Other authorities state that the number of the French and Sardinians was 12,000. Which is the highest estimate from any impartial source.

Advices from Turin announce that a popular movement had again taken place in the Duchy of Parma.

The victory of Montebello, and the success of Garibaldi at Como, together with the arrival of Prince Napoleon at Leghorn, had aroused the national enthusiasm to the highest pitch, and the expulsion of the Duchess Louisa Maria was anticipated.

The popular feeling is strongly in favor of an alliance with Sardinia, and large numbers are volunteering.

An unauthenticated report was in circulation that Prince Gortschakoff, the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, had resigned his position in the Cabinet, in consequence of the refusal of the Emperor Alexander to carry out the engagements entered into between Russia and France.

Rejoicing at the Victory of Montebello.

The Empress Eugenie had formally received the great bodies of State at the Tuileries.

On the occasion of the announcement of the victory of Montebello, congratulatory addresses were presented from various Departments of France. The Diplomatic Corps, the Senate and the Legislative body, were largely represented. The Empress addressed them in a patriotic speech, which was enthusiastically received.

Advices from Frankfort state that the war excitement has risen to a high pitch in Southern Germany.

Movements of Kossuth.

It is expected that Kossuth will leave London in the course of the ensuing week, and go to Genoa, to concert plans with Gen. Klapka, formerly commandant of the fortress of Komorn, in Hungary, and other Hungarians for the overthrow of the Austrian power in Hungary.

It is stated that Kossuth goes to Italy with the full concurrence of the Emperor Napoleon and the King of Sardinia.

Nearly all the Powers have acknowledged Francis the First as the King of Naples, and the Army and Navy have sworn allegiance to him.

Austrian Operations on Lago Maggiore.

TURIN, May 27.—The Austrian war steamers are cruising about Lake Maggiore, threatening the towns and villages on the Sardinian shore, but doing little damage.

The war steamer Radetzky appeared before Cannobio, and was driven away by the National Guards, who only fired with small arms.

Count De Salmour had gone to Naples on a secret mission for the King of Sardinia.

At San Giovanni the people have risen and pronounced in favor of the King of Sardinia.

Count De Salmour was cordially welcomed at San Giovanni by Gen. Ribotte and the Tuscan troops.

The French Siege Fleet.

TOULON, May 27.—The French siege fleet is now ready to sail from this port.

It is composed of thirty-two vessels of war and gunboats, well manned and equipped for bombarding fortifications and large towns, and its destination is unknown.

The French Minister of Marine has ordered two additional ships of the line and two frigates to proceed immediately to sea.

Garibaldi Marching on Milan.

The corps under Garibaldi are advancing on Milan, and the vanguard had already reached a point within fifteen miles of that city, where an outbreak was expected.

The force of Garibaldi is being reinforced at every town through which he passes, by volunteers who hail him as a liberator.

France.

The London Times was seized at the Paris Post-office on the 27th, and no copies of it are allowed to be delivered in France.

The Army of the East, otherwise called the Army of Observation, is to be increased by 150,000 men.

Talleyrand Peregord, a nephew of the great Talleyrand, has been appointed French Minister to Naples, the French Government having recognized Francis First as King of Naples.

Arrival of the North Briton—Dates to June 1st.

Markets.

LIVERPOOL, June 1.—The sales of Cotton for the three business days since the sailing of the Africa, amount to 28,000 bales. All qualities of cotton have advanced from 1-16 to ⅛ since Saturday. Fair and middling qualities have improved most. The market generally closed with an advancing tendency. Middling Orleans Cotton has advanced and Middling Uplands 3-16d. Clark & Son quote Middling Orleans at 6¾ and Middling uplands at 6¼.

The Liverpool breadstuffs market generally closed with a declining tendency.

The advices from Manchester and other manufacturing districts are more favorable. Goods and yarns were in good request, and the market generally closed active.

Consols.

LONDON, June 1.—The funds have experienced a sudden improvement in tone, and an advance of fully one per cent. is reported. Consols for money closed at 93¼ to 93⅜.

War in Italy.

LONDON, June 1.—The advices from the seat of war comprise nothing of decided importance which has transpired since the sailing of the Argo from Queenstown.

No important engagements has taken place since the date of our last report.

The retrograde movement of the Austrians is continued, and the Allies are closely following them, and occupying the positions abandoned by them.

The most important intelligence at Vienna is the recall of Garibaldi's troops in their advance on Milan.

The accounts are from the Austrian side, and are not yet confirmed.

The Armies of Observation.

Marshal Pelissier has arrived at Nancy, where 100,000 men of the army of the East have been concentrated.

The German Federal troops are concentrating in large force at Mayence and Rastadt.

These troops from the federal army of observation on the Rhine opposed to that of France, which is now distinguished as the army of the East.

The Germanic Diet, in view of the danger threatening the confederation have removed from Frankfort on the Main towards the centre of Germany.

The various banks and other monied establishments are removing their treasure to the fortresses, and the general aspect of affairs throughout the Germanic Confederation is very threatening.

Success of the Sardinians.

A dispatch from Turin via Paris, announces that the Sardinians have forced the passage of the Sesia after a sharp contest with the Austrians, and captured the important town of Palestro on the left bank.

Battle of Palestro.

An official bulletin gives a full account of the passage of the Sesia by the Sardinians. The passage was made at the village of Palestro which, on the left bank, was strongly fortified and held by 15,000 to 20,000 Austrians.

The Sardinians also numbered about the same. The Sardinian force engaged belonged to Gen. Cialdini's command, in which is the young Duke of Chartres; but the King, Victor Emanuel, commanded in person.

The Austrians had constructed a strong tete de pont, which they bravely defended at the point of the bayonet. But, repulsed from this, they fell back behind their fortifications in the town of Palestro.

For two hours and upwards the battle raged from street, and house to house, till finally the people of the town joining with the Sardinians, the Austrians, overpowered by superior numbers, compelled to beat a retreat.

This battle was fought under the immediate command of the King of Sardinia, who is said to have borne himself coolly and nobly throughout.

The Battle of Como.

The North Briton also brings detailed accounts of the battle at Como and neighboring village of Camerlata, between Garibaldi's forces and the Austrians, which prove to have been much more serious even than at first reported.

At Como several of the streets and strongest positions were taken and retaken several times and when the Austrians, retreating slowly and in good order, made a second and determined stand at Camerlata, there was a momentary hesitation to pursue them.

Seeing this hesitation, Garabaldi rushed into the midst of his troops and calling to mind the noble cause in which they were engaged, the freedom of Italy, they charged en masse upon the enemy, and in less than an hour they had full possession of the town.

The Austrians, however, retired slowly, and the Sardinians did not pursue.

The next day, the 28th, the telegraph from Berne reported that Garibaldi had left Camerlata, and was marching on Milan by what is called "a bold movement."

Peace Efforts Continued.

England and Prussia are still making strenuous efforts to confine the war to Italy, and even, it is said, have not yet given up all hopes of effecting an arrangement between the belligerents before a general engagement shall have been fought.

Emperor of Austria in the Field.

In the meantime, the Emperor of Austria had arrived in Italy, to place himself at the head of his army. He left Vienna the 29th, Trieste the 30th, and was at Verona on the 31st, accompanied by his brother, the Arch-Duke Maximilian, late Viceroy of Lombardy, by Gen. Hess, and a large number of the nobility.

Unfortunate Affair at Florence.

Accounts had reached Marseilles that a serious fight had taken place at Florence, between a number of English and American sailors, from the neighboring port of Leghorn.

The telegraph states that the difficulty grew out of the American sailors wearing tri-colored rosettes, (red, white and green, the Italian national colors.) No particulars, however, are given.

British Parliament.

The new British Parliament was convened on Tuesday, the 31st. Speaker Denison was unanimously re-elected to preside over the House of Commons. The question, upon which the strength of the Ministry was to be tested, had not transpired, if indeed it had been agreed upon.

English and French Funds.

The latest despatches from London brought out by the North Briton, report the English funds buoyant.

The latest despatch from Paris, at noon of the 1st inst., also reports the Bourse buoyant.

The same despatch also mentions a rumor prevailing in Paris that the Emperor Napoleon would return the 1st of August.

War Movement in Germany.

A despatch from Frankfort, received just before the steamer sailed, also states that the military committee of the German Diet had reported in favor of the resolution to place an army of observation on the Rhine.

That the policy of the State, as declared in 183 and affirmed, that emancipation be prohibited, or that the emancipated slaves hereafter be removed from the State.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, June 13, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 11th inst.: The past week has witnessed rather more movement in some of our leading staples, and it will be seen that the transactions in Cotton have reached quite a fair extent, considering the period of the season and the comparatively limited supply on sale. Tobacco, also, has been taken to some extent, though at a materially reduced basis of prices, while Sugar and Molasses, and the various articles of Western Produce, have been dealt in to a considerable extent.

On Sunday European advices four days later were received by the City of Washington from Liverpool for New York, 25th ultimo, intercepted off Cape Race. They reported a dull Cotton market at Liverpool, with sales for four days of 23,000 bales, at previous prices, the quotations for Middling Orleans being still 6¾d. On Tuesday the arrival of the City of Washington at New York was announced, and it was found that she had touched at Queenstown, Ireland, on the 26th, and obtained advices one day later than those telegraphed from Cape Race. The advices proved rather more favorable for Cotton, and stated Consols to have further improved ¼ per cent. On Thursday accounts still four days later were before the public, brought by the steamer Argo, from Galway for New York, 30th ultimo, via St. Johns, N. F. They confirmed the advices of a better tone prevailing in the Liverpool Cotton market, and reported an improved demand at the close, the sales of Saturday the 28th, being 10,000 bales, the market being steady at the previous week's quotations. Consols, also, were reported to have further improved ¼ to ⅜ per cent. At noon on Thursday, the advices by the Africa were received, and, although her accounts were anticipated by the Argo, we have the particulars of the week's business in the Liverpool Cotton market, which amounted up 52,000 bales. The market for the Middling and better grades was firm, but a decline of ⅛d. is noted in the inferior qualities. The quotations given are, for Orleans—Fair, 7⅞; Middling, 6¾d.; the stock on hand at Liverpool was stated at 610,000 bales, 553,000 being American. The advices from Manchester and the manufacturing districts were of a more favorable character, there being a good demand for goods for India, and the tone of the market had considerably improved. At Havre the week's sales were only 3,500 bales, and the quotation for tres ordinaire was still 104f.

The river is about two feet and a half below high-water mark. We have had occasional showers during the week—which, after the long dry spell, were much needed.

COTTON.—Our last report closed upon a depressed market, and we quoted a decline of ⅛c. At this reduction several buyers came forward and took about 3500 bales. On Tuesday 2500 bales were disposed of, and the same amount was taken on Wednesday, but on Thursday, with the Argo's and Africa's advices on hand, rather more full prices were claimed, and the sales were confined to about 800, and on Friday barely 700 bales were sold; making a total for the week of 19,500 bales. Total receipts of the week 2819, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,645,016 bales, against 1,526,473 bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 14,207 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 10th inst. 89,187 bales. With respect to prices, we have to state that no very marked changes have occurred within the week. The demand has been almost exclusively for the Middling descriptions and these are firm, as are also the better grades though less called for; but the lower qualities are comparatively abundant and neglected, and the occasional sales of these are at easy and irregular prices. The market is now left with few buyers, the greater number having taken their departure.

BENSON'S COMMENTARY. We have a supply of this excellent standard work, in 5 vols., royal 8vo. 14 00

[Mr Benson has always been considered by the Methodists of Great Britain as both learned and original; and as the most reliable in doctrine of all the Arminian commentators.

DUTIES OF MASTERS. By Rev. H. N. McTyeire, D. D. 60

[Methodist Preachers will, we doubt not, feel it to be a duty to place a copy of this work in the hands of every Southern Planter. It is by a Southern man—the only quarter from which we can consent to be authorized on that subject. A large experience and acquaintance with both master and servant were prerequisites demanded as absolutely essential to qualify one for writing at all, even but a little upon this important theme. The writer has satisfied a want, felt by that large proportion of masters who wish to know what they ought to do, that they may do it and discharge their obligations to God and their servants. Not the least valuable part of the book is, that it contains four letters from Bishop Andrew on the religious instruction of Negroes.]

THE GOLDEN CENSER. By Dr. Summers 50

[This most excellent work is a corner stone for rearing the family altar. Good Christian wives, who have irreligious husbands, can, with the aid of this little book, hold family prayers—until the father of the family comes to be, as he ought, the priest of his own house.

To all Dealers—with Southern Methodist Publishing-house.

In the meantime, we notify all concerned that hereafter we shall sell to wholesale dealers Books embraced in our GENERAL CATALOGUE at 25 per cent. discount on six months' time, a deduction for cash of 10 per cent. of the net amount of the bill.

On Books not of our own publication, we will allow 20 per cent. discount on six months' time, with a deduction of 10 per cent. on the net bills for cash.

This, however, does not include Sunday-school and Tract Books, nor those embraced in Part III. of our present Catalogue.

J. B. MCFERRIN, Agent.

P. S.—Those books which we publish for the authors will be placed in the second class of discounts, as above indicated.

Children's Column.

"Let the little Children to me come unto Me."

Little Agnes.

A little girl, named Agnes Elma Brown, daughter of Jessie P. and Mary Tharp, lived in Carrollton, near New Orleans, where the Editor of this paper preaches on Sunday. When we first went to the house, little Agnes came and sat upon our knee, played with our coat buttons, and was altogether one of the most beautiful and happy-spirited little girls we ever saw. But the sweet little one has been taken to the good world. She took the small pox, and, after sixteen days' sickness, died. She said she was going to see her little brother, who had died before her. She said, "Let me go up yonder and see Daddy. I am going to heaven." She was only five years old.

Death of Elma Jane Johnson.

I reckon your little readers would like to hear about the peaceful death of Elma Jane Johnson, a little girl ten years of age, who died at her grandmother's in American Bend on the 16th day of April. It will do them good to hear that the love of Jesus and the hope of heaven can make even little girls bear the sufferings of their last sickness without murmuring; and think about lying in the cold grave without a shudder. She bore her sickness very patiently, and the last words she ever spoke were, "Give me Jesus;" on the day before she died when her little throat was all ulcerated so that she could hardly talk, she said two or three times, "Give me Jesus."

It was very gratifying to her father and grandmother, who were standing around her bedside, to hear her speak those precious words. Elma Jane was always fond of going to Church and singing hymns; she was very fond of saying her catechism too, and would often ask the preacher's to hear her say it, when they would go to her grandmother's house. She used to be a great favorite with Father Lane, when he was presiding elder in this District; her father read the notice of the good old man's death, in the Advocate, to her, and told her that he asked his friends around his death-bed to sing, "Oh sing to me of heaven, when I am called to die;" she always called it Father Lane's hymn after that, and would turn to it in the hymn-book and read it very often.

I hope all your little readers will be good children, go to Church and like their catechism, so that when they come to the cold waters of death, where earthly friends will have to bid them good-bye, they will have a friend in Jesus, and be able, like Elma Jane, to say with their latest breath, "Give me Jesus."

HER PASTOR.

Do You Want a boy, Sir?

"Do you want a boy, sir?" said George, a little urchin, scarcely eight years old, to a spruce-looking clerk in a large store.

"Want a boy! Why, who wants to be hired?" asked the clerk, looking with puzzled glances at the little applicant.

"I do, sir," replied George.

"Look here, gentlemen," cried the young man, speaking to his fellow clerks, "here is a regular Goliah seeking work! Wants to be a porter, I 'spose. Look at him. Ain't he a strapper?"

The clerks gathered in great glee about poor George, who stood full of earnest purpose before them, and was therefore unconscious of any reason why he should be made an object of sport.

"What can you do?" asked one.

"You can post books of course?" said another.

"Carry a bale of goods on your shoulders, eh?" cried a third.

"Hush, young gentleman," said the elderly bookkeeper at the desk, after viewing George through his spectacles. "Hush! Don't make sport of the child. Let me talk to him." Then speaking to George in kindly tones, he said, "you are too young to be hired, my child. Who sent you here?"

"I came myself, sir. My father and mother are gone to heaven. My aunt is poor and I want to earn something to help her. I am very strong, sir, and will work very hard. Won't you please to hire me?"

The simple story, told in a way that showed how earnest the boy was, not only checked the sport of the upstart clerks, but brought tears to their eyes. They looked on the delicate child before them with pity and respect, and one of them, placing a quarter dollar on the desk, asked the rest to follow his example. They did so. He then took the money and offered it to George, saying—

"You are too small to be of any use here, my good boy. But take this money, and when you have grown a bit, perhaps we may find something for you to do."

George looked at the money without offering to touch it. "Why don't you take the money?" asked the clerk.

"If you please sir, I am no beggar boy," said George; "I only want to earn something to help to pay my aunt for keeping me."

"You are a noble little fellow," said the senior clerk. "We give you the money not because we think you a beggar, but because we like your spirit. Such a boy as you will never be a beggar. Take the change, my boy, and may God give you and your aunt better days."

George now took the money, put it carefully into his little pocket, and left the store. His aunt, needy as she was, could not help laughing when he told her this story, and the chiding she gave him for going in search of work without her consent was not very severe, you may feel assured.

I like George's spirit in this affair. It was noble, brave and self-reliant beyond his years. It was the spirit that makes poor boys grow into useful and successful men. It made George do this, for in after years that little boy became a noted artist, whose praise was spoken by many tongues. All children should cherish a desire to do all they can for themselves and to support themselves by their own labor as early as possible. Those who lean on father and mother for everything will find it hard work to get along alone by-and-by, as they may have to do when their parents die. While those who early learn to rely upon themselves will have little difficulty in earning their own living. Learn, therefore, my children, to help yourselves—always minding to do so under the advice and with the consent of your parents or guardians.—S. S. Advocate

The Lord's Prayer in Death.

A Sunday school scholar was dying. Her friends had gathered around to listen to her dying words. After she had been raised in bed, and had spoken a few words to each one, she said:

"Now, mother, I would like to have you lay my head down on the pillow."

Her request was granted.

"Now," said she, "I want to say the Lord's Prayer, just as I said it when I was a little child."

Slowly and fervently that beautiful prayer was uttered. For a few moments a smile played around the lips of the dying girl, and then that happy spirit winged its way to that better land where prayer is lost in praise.

Humboldt's Last Words.

The sun shone brilliantly into the room where Humboldt died, and it is reported that his last words addressed to his niece, were: "Wie herrlich diese Strahlen: sie scheinen die Erde zum Himmel zu rufen!" [How grand these rays: they seem to beckon Earth to Heaven!]

FRANCE AND AUSTRIA—A Record of the Past.

Within the last seventy years there have been five wars between France and Austria on the Continent of Europe. Austria was one of the first nations that took up arms against the French Revolution. In connection with Prussia, in 1792, her armies invaded France. After a desperate struggle they were driven out by the energy of the French Republican Assembly, and by the valor and military skill of Gen. Dumourier. The French Assembly, by a conscription, called out one million two hundred thousand men for the defense of the country, a military exertion which has seldom, if ever, been equaled in military annals.

Prussia and Spain withdrew from the coalition, and, in 1796, Austria was left to sustain the shock of the French in Italy. She was supported by the King of Sardinia, a state which is now her bitter enemy. The French army, under Napoleon, in two campaigns, detached Sardinia from her alliance, drove her troops out of Italy, and pursued them into Germany, nearly to the gates of Vienna. Under the walls of that capital France dictated peace to in 1797. By that peace she made large cessions of territory and influence in Germany. As a recompense, Napoleon assigned her Venice and Lombardy, and first made her an Italian power.

In 1799 Austria and Russia took up arms against France, and for a time were very successful. They drove the French out of Italy. The latter part of that year, however, Napoleon returned from Egypt. He induced the Russian Emperor Paul to withdraw from the Austrian alliance. Having accomplished this, he led his army into Italy. On the plans of Marengo he fought a decisive battle, the result of which expelled Austria from Italy. It was soon followed up by the victory of Hohenlinden, in Germany, gained by the French under General Moreau. The French columns were again near Vienna, and again France compelled Austria to sue for peace. In 1804 the Emperor of France became the King of Italy. Immediately after, Austria and Russia attacked France. Such, however, was the power of the latter, that in six months one Austrian army was destroyed at Ulm, and another, together with the Russians, destroyed at Austerlitz. The French entered Vienna, and again dictated a peace.

In 1809 Austria and France again met in collision on the tented field. The French, however, under Napoleon, marched down the valley of the Danube with the velocity, almost of the wind, and in one campaign took up their quarters in Vienna. A severe and ignominious peace for Austria was the result. In 1813 Austria, united with all the great powers of Europe, overthrow the French Empire, and broke down the power which had so often entered the gates of Vienna in triumph. By the treaties of 1814 and 1815 the Northern States of Italy, Venice and Lombardy, were ceded to Austria by the leading nations of Europe. It is now on the faith of these treaties that Austria rests her case, and appeals to the rest of Germany and to England to assist her in maintaining them inviolate. As they were the treaties which witnessed the humiliation of his uncle, Louis Napoleon has no great respect for them.

NEBAT.

Here is quite an enigma. Nebat is mentioned at least eighteen times, in three different books of the sacred history, and in such associations as one would shrink from as an infamous entail on one's name; yet his life and character are as utterly unknown as if he never existed! For a man to obtain immortal dishonour would seem to require at least one enormous crime, or one flagitious trait to descend with his name. When Erostratus could devise no other way of getting his name into history he set fire to the temple of Diana, at Ephesus. But though Nebat is as immortal as the Bible, not a trace of his life, not a feature of his person or character, not a word that he uttered, not a line that he wrote, is recorded or preserved in any matter.

The sad but instructive solution of the riddle is, Nebat was the father of an ungodly child. He is a historical monument to illustrate the proverb, "A foolish son is the calamity of his father;" and to show that "such a son" "causeth shame and bringeth reproach" to his parents, even when they may not be alive to feel the stroke, and though they may not, as in Eli's case, have winked at iuiquity; for Nebat was dead before the wickedness of Jeroboam was developed in the form which has confirmed his disgrace; and there is no record that impeaches the parental faithfulness of Zeruah, Nebat's widow. But the dishonored father is now inseparably linked with the corrupt and corrupting child, simply because of the natural relationship. It was "Jeroboam, the son of Nebat," who "lifted up his hands against the king;" it was "Jeroboam, the son of Nebat," who "did sin, and made Israel to sin." It is the fate of the house of "Jeroboam, the son of Nebat," which is held up as a warning against rebellion and idolatry. The sins of the son became proverbial, but the father's name is part of the proverb. It seals the character of fifteen kings of Israel, that they walked in the ways of the son of Nebat, and those ways at length brought the whole kingdom into captivity and dispersion.

SIDNEY SMITH ON ENJOYMENT.

The great wit and reviewer never penned wiser and truer words than these: "Mankind are always happier for having been happy; so that if you make them happy now, you make them happy twenty years hence by the memory of it. A childhood passed with a due mixture of rational indulgence, under fond and wise parents, diffuses over the whole of life a feeling of calm and pleasure, and in extreme old age is the very last remembrance which time can erase from the mind of man. No enjoyment, however inconsiderable, is confined to the present moment. A man is the happier for life for having once made an agreeable tour, or lived for any length of time with pleasant people, or enjoyed any considerable interval of innocent pleasure, which contributes to render old men so attentive to the scenes before them, and carries them back to the world that is past and to scenes never to be renewed again."

WOMAN THE INSPIRER OF GREAT DEEDS.

Love is inspiration; it encourages to great deeds, and develops the creative faculty of our nature. Few great men have flourished who, were they candid, would not acknowledge the vast advantages they have experienced in the earlier years of their career from the spirit and sympathy of woman. It is woman whose prescient administration strings the lyre of the desponding poet, whose genius is afterwards to be recognized by his race, and which often embalms the memory of the gentle mistress, whose kindness solaced him in less glorious hours. How many an official portfolio would never have been carried had it not been for her sanguine spirit and assiduous love! How many a depressed and desponding advocate has clutched the Great Seal and taken his precedence before princes, borne onward by the breeze of her inspiring hope, and illuminated by the sunshine of her prophetic smile! A female friend, amiable, clever and devoted, is a possession more valuable than parks and palaces; and, without such a muse, few men can succeed in life—none be content.—d'Israeli.

A MOTHER TEACHING HER CHILD TO PRAY.

Is at once an object the most sublime and tender the imagination can well conceive of. Elevated above earthly things, she seems like one of those guardian angels, the companion of our earthly pilgrimage, through whose ministrations we are inclined to do good or turn from evil.

PARIS MODES AND STEEL STAYS.

The London Court Journal says: "A regular crusade has been entered into by the doctors of Paris against the frightful fashion of steel stays, brought in with the new cut of dress now in vogue. Attention has been drawn to the subject, and a report sent into the Academy of Medicine, in consequence of the sudden death of the two young ladies employed in one of the fashionable houses of this place to show off the fashions. These young ladies, whose sole business was to walk up and down the Magasin, where the wonders of the imagination of the proprietors are displayed, vying with each other in the degree to which torture could be borne, had gradually accustomed themselves to be drawn so tight that in one case the bursting of a blood-vessel was the consequence, and in the other congestion of the lungs carried off the victim in a few hours."

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

THOMAS EVANS died at the residence of his brother-in-law, P. B. Tompkins, Esq., Warren county, Mississippi, 14th May, 1859, in his fifty-ninth year. He was the son of Moses Evans, was born in Marion District, S. C.; and, in early life, removed to this county. He was raised by pious parents, who were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was baptized by that good man, of sacred memory, Tobias Gibson. He embraced religion when young, and acknowledged his baptismal obligations as a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he lived an humble and consistent Christian for more than forty years, and died in the triumph of a living faith. His first wife was a Miss Johnson, with whom he lived in conjugal affection for many years, raised several interesting children—four of whom still live. His house was always a home for the ministers of Jesus—many of whom will remember him and his amiable wife with gratitude. His second wife was the widow of the Rev. Mr. Horton, (once of the Mississippi Conference, and now, we trust, in heaven). She still lives, to mourn her great loss. Bro. Evans was a good citizen, an affectionate husband, fond parent, a humane master, and a humble and useful member of the church. P. E. GREEN.

May 26th, 1859.

MRS. MARY STONE, wife of Mr. Isaac Stone, was born in Green county, Ga.; her early life was spent in Abbeville District, S. C.; moved from thence to Alabama, but subsequently settled in this county, where, after a residence of more than twenty years, she died of consumption, on the 22d May last, in her 61st year. For about thirty-five years she was an humble follower of the Savior, and for the greater part of that time a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Her last hours were marked with signal triumph of Divine grace. A few days before her death, while peace and joy Divine filled her heart, she proclaimed to her disconsolate husband and friends—"I have gained the victory at last, and am ready to depart." May each surviving member of her bereaved family be so fortunate, in the dark hour of death as to say as she did, "I have gained the victory at last."

TRUTH ON IMPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a complimentary notice of that paper from our friend Vesey, of North Mississippi and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and recommendations we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and education. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, which I did at my request, in the Conservative of the 21st inst.

Col Vesey was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY

[From the Conservative.]

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY:—Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I deem it my duty to you, and to the community at large, to make the following statement, and I therefore, respectfully request you to permit me to occupy a few lines in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my friend, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and, having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, relying, by the way, upon the experience of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This, I thought a remarkable number for a healthy infant. But to my great amazement, about one o'clock the first morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and forty-six from the evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty-three, the day—the next day (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a fourth as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length, and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such a gratifying effect in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited; 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

W. H. VESEY.

A LETTER FROM CHUNNENUGGEE RIDGE.

Mr. Enron.—It has come to pass in my wanderings, that I have reached this delightful spot for the first time. I do not at all wonder that it is so highly praised by those who reside here, for I think it one of the most desirable places for a residence in South Alabama. The country to the South gradually rises for several miles, until at this point, the rise terminates in a bold bluff of several hundred feet in height, furnishing most extensive and delightful views on the north and northwest.

The Chunnenuggee Indians formerly occupied this ridge with their wigwams, council-house, etc., and cultivated the adjacent vallies, and many traditions and incidents of thrilling interest are narrated of times long past.

I am agreeably surprised to find this section so well supplied with schools. Dr. Ellison is at the head of the Female College, numbering sixty pupils; Bro. W. Threadgill has a Male School with about the same number. At Union Springs, four miles from this, Bro. Butterfield and lady have a Male and Female Academy numbering nearly as many scholars as both the schools on the Ridge. These, with the Colleges and Male Schools at Tuskegee, Auburn, Cotton Valley, and other points in the county, constitute a supply of educational facilities, equal, if not superior, to those of any other county in the State. The people of Macon county deserve great credit for their enterprise and devotion to the interests of education.

While upon this subject, I am reminded that Dr. Garland, President of the University of Alabama, is endeavoring, in a series of articles in the Mobile Tribune, to point out the causes of the languishing condition of that Institution. It is a matter of surprise that a gentleman of his intelligence and sagacity, should fail to see at once the reason of this condition of things. Instead of looking for it in special occurrences, or unfortunate legislation, it will be found in its character as a State Institution. The public mind, especially that of the religious public, which furnishes the larger portion of students for our colleges, has deliberately reached the conclusion that they must be superceded by denominational institutions. Hence, of the scores that have been formed, with munificent endowments, there are scarcely three, which have not become essentially denominationalized, that are in a flourishing condition; and the exceptions can be easily accounted for. If Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians—dissatisfied with the religious tone of State colleges—establish each their own, and patronize them as they are doing in almost every State, how can the former be expected to flourish? The Churches find that neither their interests nor those of education are properly subserved by such establishments, and hence their course.

Speaking of the different Churches reminds me of recent occurences worthy of note. Not many weeks since, the public prints announced that Bishop Cobbs had been made the medium of returning some $900 from some unknown party, to the person from whom it had been fraudulently obtained years since. More recently, the Rev. Mr. Mitchell, pastor of the Episcopal Church in Montgomery, has been made the agent for returning near $3000 to the State, which had been unjustly gotten. This is hopeful: it shows returning sensibility in the right direction. There is no doubt much more behind to come if men would see God in peace; and the parties interested will do well to make haste, or death may make it forever too late. Has Methodism any heirs in Alabama, who have this work to do?

Our brethren of Georgia are kindly furnishing Dr. Myers with serial essays for his paper. Bro. Bright is trying to fix upon the public mind the truth, that man is fallen! We all admit that fact in this region; for we see him down. Our trouble is, to find some means for raising him up. When Bro. B. reaches that point, we shall hear him with interest. President Thomas has been exposing the errors of Dr. Sasnet, in opposing a system of common schools by the State. His position in the present condition of things amounts to an argument for ignorance. For it is certain that the Church is not able, and is not going to attempt to supply this desideratum. It is unfortunate for a man to be too much of an original thinker. It is worse for a man to publish all he thinks.

Our Baptist friends seem generally to be very well satisfied with the proceedings and results of the recent biennial Convention. The Graves men found themselves in a hopeless minority, but G. will go home and adopt some plan of operation that will bring money. He is bound to make that out of his bigotry, whatever else he may lose. His course reminds me of the fox who had the misfortune to lose his tail in a trap, and then set about persuading all his associates to have theirs cut off that they might be alike. He has conducted himself in such an ungodly manner that other denominations will not fellowship him, and now he wishes his brethren to join him and advocate non-fraternization! The spirit and sentiment are most execrable. But did you ever think, Mr. Editor, how little the rest of the Christian community lose by this move, thus far? Very little indeed, for if there be any set of men in the land who are called Christians whose fellowship could be spared without loss, this is the class. Look them over as far as you know them, and you will agree with me in this. I hardly know of one of them, whose Christian and moral character is not at a sad discount with the public in the community where he lives. They are remarkable for not being able to command the good opinion of those who know them best! As this "old landmark" movement is likely to be confined to this class of men, we need not grieve much over our loss.

MORE ANON.

For the New-Orleans Christian Advocate.

LETTER FROM TABLE ROCK, S. C.

Mr. Editor: You will doubtless be surprised to find that I am so far away from my field of labor—my home in Tennessee. My health having totally failed, I have been forced to surrender my charge. I am now seeking in the pure air of my native land, a restoration. In this, I fear I shall be disappointed. I am not in despair. I thank God for a cheerful disposition—a heart that seeks the sunshine.

I write you this from the lofty summit of "Table Rock," one of nature's greatest wonders.

From Memphis I came by railroad to Pendleton, S. C.—the present terminus of the Blue Ridge railroad. From Pendleton to this place (thirty-five miles) on horseback. My traveling-companion, J. J. Lewis, Esq., is familiar with all these mountain paths. To enjoy everything as you pass, a well-informed guide is indispensable. We reached Southerland's hotel, at the foot of the mountain, just at sunset. I was glad to stretch my wearied limbs upon a straw mattrass, and forget the evils of life in dreamless slumber.

At half-past five in the morning we were ready to ascend the great rock—it seemed but a stone's throw from the hotel, and I had my hat and cane in hand ready for the walk. Old Gaston, the guide, came in and said the horses were saddled, and we must ride to the base of the rock. I insisted upon walking, as the distance was seemingly insignificant.

A gawky fellow standing by, eyed me closely for a moment, and then, half laughing, said, "Mister, if you try walkin up to that rock, and go on top and back again with them legs, you'll have Balshazar's complaint before night."

"And what was that?" said I.

"Why, a smilin at the knees." He twisted his head on one side, and twisted off the end of a tobacco-plug with the motion, winked at my companion, and left me to consider the caution he had given.

Not having very great faith in "them legs," I concluded to profit by his hint, and we mounted our horses for the ride. The rock seemed hanging just over our heads. For a long mile our horses toiled upward upward still; and, when we had gone as far as we could venture on horseback, the rock was towering still above us, seemingly far higher than when we viewed it from the valley, a mile below. Securing our horses, we began the slow and tedious task of climbing to the summit, stopping occasionally to rest and look back upon the blue hills and valleys which stretched far away behind us. At length we reached the first platform or bench. From this, a wooden stairway rises almost perpendicularly to the top of the rock. So narrow is this bench or shelf that a single step backward, from the foot of the steps, would plunge you into the deep abyss which gapes hundreds of feet below.

Let no nervous man attempt these steps. Old Gaston, the guide, says, that "de ladies as wars hoops is werry much discommodemented gwine up on de rock." "Uncle Gid" of Choctaw county, Mississippi, used to say, when charged with being tipsy, that he "was allers indicated to a swimmin in the head." Persons less afflicted than Uncle Gid will be very apt to have a touch of the complaint before they reach the top of this air-line stairway.

Once on the steps, the way is safe, but long and tedious; you will likely wish, before you are half-way up, that you were safe in the valley below.

Onward, upward—onward, upward still you toil, and fear to look behind you lest the brain grow dizzy on beholding the blue depths that lie beneath,—grasping the hand-railing with a firmer hold at every step—scarcely daring to look down even to see where to place your feet—you feel for each successive step as you mount, and place one foot firmly, surely down, before you venture to move another. At length, exhausted and breathless you reach the smilit summit, and shudder as you turn to behold the blue abyss below and think of the dangers you have passed.

An attempt to describe the Table Rock would be fruitless—it must be seen to be appreciated. The descent is less difficult. Men usually go downhill faster than they go up. With me, it was a backward movement—standing two thousand two hundred feet in the air, with an abrupt precipice below, no bottom in sight; this was more than I could face; so I turned my back upon the magnificent distances and depths below, and coned it to the foot of the stairway.

On reaching the base of the rock, we passed round to the northwest side, close under the precipice—down which the clear, cold water is for ever dripping, dropping—oozing out from every fissure and crevice in little threads of silvery whiteness.

Going around the base for more than a mile, we came at length to the "Basin"—a natural reservoir, filled with the clearest coldest water—so clear is it, that the smallest pebble in its bed is distinctly seen. Above you frowns the solid granite wall, the summit lost to your vision, while on either side, as you face it, there stretches out an endless chain of rock—a wall, whose summit is lost in the broad expanse of blue, above, and its length seems bounded only by the bending sky on either side.

From this point, you bear the roar and catch a view of the "Slicking Falls." This bright and beautiful river rises in the mountains northwest of the rock, and separated from it only by a narrow valley. The visitor to Table Rock should never fail to visit the Falls of the Slicking; it is a scene of rare beauty, and is easy of approach from this neighborhood.

From the falls, we returned to the hotel and found a plain dinner served up; and, thanks to the mountain air and exercise, we ate it with an appetite.

I am now in the ball-room of the hotel—as the season advances crowds will revel here; and there will be music and feasting and dancing through the long, hot summer months. All is now quiet and still. Old Gaston has hung up his fiddle and bow, and, until the crowd of pleasure-seekers arrive, he will beguile the tedious hours by moderately exercising himself with the shovel and the hoe, in his patch of beans and "Buncombe cabbages."

On the table, by my side, there is an old register—hotel register—which dates away back in the years gone by; long before distance was annihilated by railroads. From this old book I purpose transcribing many curious things, for it is filled with such; and, in my next, you shall have the benefit of my researches through this Ohio.

We go from this place to "Caesar's Head," in Greenville District, South Carolina; then, across the mountains to "Old Buncombe State"—North Carolina. We expect to visit "White Sides," "Chimney Tops," Jocasse valley, White Water Falls, and the Blue Ridge tunnell.

The summer is almost upon us, and I am anxious to be again among my people in the West. I know not when I shall turn my steps in that direction; not for many weeks perhaps, unless my health should rapidly improve.

From this place I will write you again.

BIOGRAPHICAL.—REV. WM. H. CRENSHAW.

Mr. Editor.—When I first saw the Louisiana Conference, it met at Baton Rouge; Bishop Paine presided, and Brother Crenshaw was the secretary. He was evidently one of the ruling minds of that body. For that year, and the three subsequent, he was the Presiding Elder of the Baton Rouge District; and, if I mistake not, he had been appointed to that responsible post in the fourth year of his ministry, that is, as soon as he was eligible. It was impossible to be with him for a few minutes only without perceiving the cause of his very general popularity. Few men could entertain a company with greater conversational ease. He seemed to glide into and lead the flow of thought and discussion which was most opportune to the occasion and to the persons present. The way in which he accomplished that most difficult feat—the drawing out a circle of acquaintances into pleasant conversation—was in itself refreshing. Amid the uneven and disturbing forces of political and party questions, to which unfortunately he too often exposed himself, he still maintained, with men of the most opposite opinions, the most agreeable and the most friendly relations.

Impulsive and out-spoken, he sometimes excited in others warmth and surprise, but which passed away the first time they came again into his presence, as the breeze and rain of a mid-summer cloud cool the heat which made it.

As a Pastor, he was most universally beloved by those who knew him best—the people of Baton Rouge. He had resided long with them, and no one could or ever will displace him in their affection. During the last several years he has been a local Preacher, and has filled for the most part appointments in its neighborhood, and was to have preached at Sandy Creek on the very day he died.

He did much to support the Methodist Church in Baton Rouge—planted the trees, which now shade it with his own hands; and during the last year was forward in the purchase of its parsonage.

He was a very public spirited man, and had much at heart the welfare of the city and its public institutions. The crowded streets and saddened countenances which witnessed the funeral, told of the deep interest all felt in one who had so long lived a neighbor and friend among them, an active, generous, high-minded citizen. There were doubtless amongst those who followed him to his grave, orphans and widows, and poor people, who could have told how generously that heart beat, which, alas, is now still forever. His memory is pleasant. Our friend "Sit illi terra levis."!

ROGERS' PANELS FOR THE CAPITOL.

Mr. Bigelow, of the New York Evening Post, writing from Rome, furnishes the annexed description of the doors which the sculptor, Rogers, is making for the Capitol at Washington: I found nothing in the studios of the sculptors in Rome which interested me quite as much as the doors which Rogers had been making for the Capitol at Washington. The casts are now at the foundery in Munich.

The life of Columbus is the artist's text. He has selected what he regards as the nine most picturesque events of the career of the illustrious navigator, and has appropriated one to each of the eight panels, and the arch of which the door is composed, four panels being on each leaf. Thus each panel contains a finished picture in alto relievo.

No. 1. Represents Columbus before the court of Salamanca, endeavoring to convince them of the existence of another continent, and the possibility of discovering it. Discouraged by their objections and offended by their opposition, he retired to the convent of La Rabida, whose prior, Juan Parez, henceforth became his constant friend. From La Rabida he entered into negotiations with the King of Portugal, and offered him the service Spain had declined. In the meantime Isabella, actuated partly by the arguments of the good friar, whose guest Columbus remained, agreed to give a second hearing to his propositions, and sent him a sum of money to equip himself and purchase a mule.

No. 2. Represents Columbus leaving the convent on the mule presented by the Queen. He is in the act of bidding farewell to the good fathers, who crowd the archways of the portico and cluster around their friend, giving him their benediction, and not forgetting the refreshment of the poor animal, to whom they are offering a draught of water.

No. 3. Shows Columbus before Ferdinand and Isabella, after his return to court. Columbus stands in the foreground, the chief figure of the piece, and with upraised head and outstretched arms is urging his suit. Ferdinand shows his indifference by leaning back in his seat inattentive, while the ardent Isabella bends forward, eagerly catching every word which falls from the orator's lips.

No. 4. The departure of Columbus from Palos, the port from which he sailed in quest of the New World. He stands with his left foot planted on the gang-plank, ready to enter the caraval when he has said farewell to his friends.

No. 5. The landing at San Salvador. Columbus occupies the center of the picture, and is elevated above the surrounding group. He holds in one hand a sword and in the other the banner of Leon and Castile, and is taking possession of the country in the name of his sovereigns. It is the largest of the representations, occupying the space of two panels. The filling up is beautiful and varied. On the left hand is the vessel, on which some of the adventurers still remain, then Columbus elevated on a point of rock. Between the caraval and himself are ardent mariners, some wading in the water, some just touching land, all in attitudes expressive of joy and thanksgiving. To the right the space on the margin of the picture is filled with Indians, secreting themselves behind the trees.

No. 6. Erecting the cross on the island of Hispaniola.

No. 7. Entering Barcelona on horseback, and in triumph, on his return to Spain.

No. 8. Leaving the town of Isabella in chains, a prisoner, and succeeded in his command by Bobadilla.

No. 9. the death of Columbus.

On the rails which divide the panels horizontally are six portrait busts of the historians of that time, who wrote about the discovery of America, namely: Peter Martyr, Las Casas, Diego Mendez, Mendoza, Bernal Diaz and Marco Polo. On the lower rails are two ideal busts of Indians; on the upper are two busts of squaws—making in all ten busts.

On either side of the panels, from the floor to the arch, are sixteen niches containing statuettes, in full relief, of the distinguished contemporaries of Columbus, such as Ferdinand and Isabella, Martin Alonzo Pinzon, Vincent Yanez Pinzon, Don Bartholomew Columbus, Juan Parez, Toscannelli, Juan Ponce de Leon, an Indian Chief and his wife, Anacorvana—in all, sixteen.

DEATH OF BARON HUMBOLDT.

The telegraph briefly announces the death of Baron Frederick Henry Alexander Humboldt, the great German naturalist, the cosmopolitan traveler, and the scientific man of world-wide reputation. This event was not unanticipated; for ill-health has been upon him for some time, and it was known that the infirmities of age were fast weakening the ties of life. He predicted, we believe, his demise this year, and the prediction is now verified.

Baron Humboldt was born in Berlin, September 14th, 1769. He was educated with a view to employment in the direction of the government mines, successively at Gottingen, Frankfort-on-the-Oder, at Hamburg, and at the mining school of Frieburg. In 1792, he was appointed assessor to the mining board, a post which he shortly exchanged for that of a director of the works at Baireuth. In 1795, he relinquished these duties, in order to connect himself to those pursuits of investigation and discovery in which he has won an undying name. From the earliest period, he had evinced a faculty of physical enquiry, which he had assiduously cultivated by the study of chemistry, botany, geology, and galvanism; the latter then a new and inchpiant science. He now proceeded to condense and arrange his scientific ideas, and test them by the known, before applying them in countries yet unexplored. His next care was to look around for a country whose ill-known national riches might open to the industrious inquirer a prospect of numerous and valuable discoveries.

Some of his investigations with Hutier, Bach, and Bonpland, were interrupted about 1797 by the existence of war.

On the 4th of June, 1799, Humboldt and Bonpland sailed from Corunna, and on the 19th landed at Santa Cruz, Teneriffe. Here they made some observations in regard to the peak of Teneriffe, and then sailed for America, arriving at Cumana on the 16th of July. The travelers remained in South America, exploring and examining various portions of it, until January, 1803, when they visited Mexico.

In January, 1804, Humboldt arrived in Philadelphia, where he remained some two months; in August, of the same year, landed in Havre—having collected a number of objects in botany, zoology, geology, geography, statistics and ethnography. His researches in these various departments have already been given to the world, we believe.

In 1818 he visted Italy with Gay-Lussac, and in 1826 traveled in England.

He then returned to Berlin, where he enjoyed the personal favor and intimacy of his Sovereign, was made a Councillor of State, and was trusted with more than one diplomatic mission. In 1829 at the particular desire of the Czar, he visited Siberia and the Caspian Sea in company with Gustav Rose and Ehrenberg.

The "Men of the Time," from which we collate these interesting facts in the life of the great naturalist, concludes thus: "In addition to the general and ultimate gain to humanity, of such an advance in society as Humboldt has effected, is to be reckoned the immediate partial benefit of his observations, according to which charts have been constructed, agriculture extended, and territories peopled. Humboldt is most popularly known by his "Cosmos," a work written in the evening of his life, in which he contemplates all created things as linked together, and forming one whole, animated by eternal forces."

We may add that he was a great admirer of the United States, and took considerable interest in observing the movements of our armies in Mexico.

TANTIA TOPEE.

The Bombay correspondent of the London Times, in a letter dated April 26, says: "The capture of Tantia Topee only preceded his trial and execution by a few days. He was brought to a drum-head court-martial at Sepree, on the 15th of April, and sentenced to death. He was hanged on the 18th.

Tantia answered questions put to him in Hindustani curtly and apparently straightforwardly; he appeared not to understand much English, and, to inquiries of him in English or by tyros in Hindustani he quietly answered "mahun nai." For Burra Sahib, Major Meade, Tantia appeared to have considerable respect. Meade is reported by his own men and all who know him to be a kind man and a good soldier.

Tantia had his charge read to him on Wednesday and Thursday, to which he made a statement, which was afterwards prepared and read to him by a moonshee; he listened attentively, now and then correcting the moonshee. He afterwards signed this latter document in good English writing, "Tantia Topee." He disclaimed all participation in the massacre at Cawnpore or in the killing of Europeans, except in a fair fight; and he also absolved from the same imputation the Nana Sahib, who, Tantia says, was at one time made a prisoner by his own men, because he would not proceed with them to Delhi. Tantia attributes the massacre and subsequent murders to the unrestrained, infuriated soldiery. He stated that he himself put provisions, &c., on board the boats at Cawnpore, and that no orders were given to commit the atrocities that ultimately took place.

At the battle of the Betwa he had the greatest rebel army which had been under his command—22,000 men, with 130 pieces of artillery, but afterwards at Kooneh it had dwindled down to 8,000.

Sir Hugh Rose in his Gwalior dispatches gives Tantia Topee credit for the skilful disposition of his troops when Sir Hugh attacked them and made the rebels so quickly fly from Gwalior.

When the officer told him the previous day to prepare for his trial, Tantia said that he knew that for fighting against the British government his punishment would be death; he wanted no court, and he therefore wished to be dispatched (holding up his manacles) from this misery, either from a gun or by the noose, as quickly as possible. He did not wish to see his family, but the only thing he asked the government was that they would not punish his family for transactions in which they had no concern.
